Urgency and opportunity

Editorial

Wherever we find ourselves this year when Rosh Hashanah arrives – in this part of the world or some other, at home or in synagogue, with family or alone – one of the key sentiments that we must keep in mind and close to heart is the feeling of peoplehood that ties us all together.

Irrespective of gender, age, station in life, place of habitation, level of ritual observance or religious affiliation, the common tracing to the One Source of our Rosh Hashanah celebrations binds us together in ways that the rest of the world does not quite understand. Indeed, that we, too, so often do not quite understand.

But at this time of year, we can sense more concretely some of the meaning of that abstract connection of togetherness, in part through the familiar language of our prayers and teachings, and the vaguely reassuring comfort that derives from hearing and singing them once again.

Similarly, the images on this page also help, in part to concretize the sense of peoplehood that ties Jews together across time and space. They depict in actual, living detail the ethereality of and the ideal world imagined in our prayers.

The young man at the centre of the page sounds the shofar, perhaps the central symbol of Rosh Hashanah, at the Western Wall in Jerusalem wearing the uniform of the Israel Defence Forces.

As our liturgy tells us, the stirring and weeping sounds of the shofar are intended to awaken us to the urgency and the opportunity of the new year. They summon us. They demarcate a new starting point for each one of us spiritually as well as chronologically. "God is in the very sound of the shofar," we read in our prayers. Do we hear that we are being called?

In our prayers we beseech God to "reign over the world from Mount Zion, from His Holy Jerusalem," where the young soldier is standing.

Reflections after 40 years

Donald Carr

As we approach 5772, I am reminded that we have just celebrated the 40th anniversary of the current ownership of The Canadian Jewish News. This, then, is an appropriate time for some musings.

The grand design for The CJN, as produced currently, was the brainchild of one of Canada's most knowledgeable, committed and prescient members of the Jewish community — the late Ray D. Wolfe.

His was not only a dream, but also the ability to bring to the fore a newspaper that would be representative of all of the mainstreams of our community, freed from individual bias or predispositions, except for one tenet: a better informed community becomes a healthier community. In turn, a healthy Jewish community is a substantial asset, not only to Jews in Israel and across the rest of the world, but also to Canadian society in general. In 1971, there was no independent Jewish newspaper dedicated to reflecting those mainstreams and speaking for and to them. He, and the small group whom he gathered around himself, acquired The Canadian Jewish News.

Donald Carr

Over four decades, the world in general and the Jewish world in particular have changed radically. However, our prime aim — of creating a better, informed community — has not.

A newspaper such as this has responsibilities far beyond those of our commercial cousins. Beyond journalistic integrity, required of all papers, we must observe the enjoinder, phrased so eloquently by Rabbi Gunther Plaut, the first chairman of our editorial advisory committee, as part of our mission statement, that we must "serve the Jewish People in all its habitations."

We have seen the paper grow in size, change its format to that of a tabloid, adopt extensive use of vibrant colour, expand the number and attributes of our columnists, and carry news and comment from various parts of the country and abroad. We have been the frequent recipient of awards from our peers in the United States and in Canada, and extended our coverage of elections held locally, provincially and nationally. The world of business has become of importance in our columns, while the arts have found their regular place weekly. We carry exclusive reports from our own correspondents in Israel.

We have long recognized that younger members of our community do not feel the nostalgia and comfort of the crispness and the folds of newsprint (not to mention the black residue on the fingers, which used to be the telltale indicator of a newspaper reader). They prefer to sit before a screen — be it on a laptop, tablet or smart phone. Thus we have jumped into cyberspace with Heebonics and our various websites, designed to meet their requirements.

This is not the best of times, economically, for any print newspaper. Many have fallen by the wayside, fatally affected by recession, fleeing advertisers and the inability to capture or retain sufficient readership. Without being cavalier and without ignoring the effect of these events on The CJN, we believe that we have taken the measure of these circumstances and have adjusted to them.

One of the many challenges which we have faced and overcome, is the peculiar position of the weekly paper in bringing "news" to its readers. Unlike the daily, which is distributed door to door or on newsstands early each morning, The CJN's news is dated before the paper has been delivered by mail some two or three days after it has been locked up and printed. Our readers already know more recent news from other media. We do not even attempt to compete. What we do bring, however, is news from those arenas that are of little interest to the dailies, to television or to radio — news of, or about Jewish communities worldwide, news and opinion that is not so neatly and insightfully packaged anywhere else.

How do we gauge what success we have in bringing our readership what it wants?

We are sometimes accused, by some, of being the lap dog of the organized Jewish community, while others criticize us for ignoring too often what that organized Jewish community does. Frequently, letters to the editor rail at our "weak-kneed left-wing stance," while others denounce a "stubborn right-wing reactionary viewpoint." Some might say that those criticisms echo an ambivalent approach by the paper. Others, though, — and we are among them — would aver that if those are the reactions of devotees of one philosophy or another, they demonstrate that we must be doing things right! To ever believe, for one moment, that we can be all things to all readers would be foolhardy.

As we move through the cyberspace age, where the means of communication must change and are changing, we will remain true to the basic tenet, to help build a healthy Jewish community. I believe that is what we are doing.

For all our readers and the communities beyond, may we enjoy a peaceful, sweet and productive new year.

Harper urges Palestinians to return to talks

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Prime Minister Stephen Harper last week called on the Palestinians to return to the negotiating table with Israel and drop their attempts to seek statehood by applying for full membership at the United Nations.

It's a position the Canadian government has held since at least May, when Harper attended the G-8 summit in Deauville, France, where he helped shape a declaration on the Palestinian-Israeli peace process that urged renewed negotiations between the sides without asking for Israel to go back to its pre-1967 borders as a precondition for talks.

Harper forcefully reiterated his position last week while attending the UN's 2011 General Assembly amid moves by the Palestinian Authority to make a unilateral declaration of independence through its application to the UN, thereby circumventing the peace process.

"There's no likelihood of this initiative by the PA doing anything to further the peace process," Harper told reporters in New York last Tuesday.

"It's possible that it could be counter-productive. But I would say, if the PA is serious about establishing a sovereign state, the method to do that is not a declaration here at the UN."

Harper returned to Ottawa a day later. He didn't address the General Assembly, but reports out of New York last week indicated that Foreign Minister John Baird had worked hard behind the scenes to try to stop the Palestinians from submitting their bid to the UN, to no avail.

Last Friday, PA President Mahmoud Abbas presented his people's application for statehood to UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon.

Ban then sent the application to the UN Security Council for consideration.

A NEW YEAR, A NEW BEGINNING

Rosh Hashana is traditionally a time to look back at the year just past. It is also a time of looking forward to a New Year... a new beginning.

May this New Year be one of peace. Peace of mind, peace of spirit, and may it bring peace and a new beginning to the people of Isreal.

Preparing for Rosh Hashanah

From the editor's desk...

Long before the last discomforting dropules of summer's humidity had been blown southward by cooler September breezes, the quiet, curly-haired tailor's thoughts turned to the approaching holy days.

He had to prepare.

Of course, preparations now were different than they had been before the war; but then, everything was different now than it once was before the war.

Before the war – rather, more accurately, before he was conscripted into the Polish army before the war – he was a young apprentice tailor learning his craft from his father, who had learned it a half century earlier from his father.

It was a wonderful way to be taught the secrets of the thread, the needle and the bolt of cloth; how to examine the fabric against the light; how to understand the deep texture of its weave; how to cut sparingly; how to stitch artfully; how to join pieces seamlessly; how to conduct business honestly.

Sitting with his older brother close by their father, he observed as the master traced the path where the thread would flow, folded the cloth, sewed, tugged, inspected, measured, tugged, sewed and inspected again.

For more than a decade, he and his brother sat alongside their father, watching and sewing. Eventually, he became an excellent tailor. In the process, he became an excellent singer as well, for, as the trio worked, they also sang.

It was joyful and pleasant, and, like the existence of most shtetl Jews, surrealistic against the poverty of a dirt-road village in early-20th-century Poland, a spectacle of sight, sound and even occasional serenity.

In the month before Rosh Hashanah, the songs that filled the cramped workroom were, naturally, prayers from the machzor. The tailor and his two apprentices sang with the intensity that the season and their circumstances compelled: urgently, emphatically, a harmonic fusion of pleading and vulnerability, a choral readying of the soul for the Divine judgement that awaited them imminently with the sighting of the next new moon.

More poignantly however, they sang with empathy and understanding: Yitgadal, the cantor's Kaddish – broadly, expansively, as befitting a fanfare of greeting for the One True Monarch; Areshet Sefateinu – assertively, yet hopefully, a reconciliation of confidence and anxiety; and Avinu Malkeinu, tearfully, a plea to Heaven.

Neighbours and friends literally lined up outside the small house/workshop to bring the tailoring trio the clothes that needed repair or alteration for Yom Tov. But they always found reason to linger a few extra moments near the house after they deposited their torn or threadbare garments and to return the very next day to inquire as to the state of the garments' readiness.

In truth however, the neighbours and friends came to the shop because they needed to hear the old tailor and his two young apprentices sing as much as they needed to have them sew. Nor was it infrequently that, from within the cluster of neighbours and friends milling in and around the house, a few people might join in the tailors' tunes, or hum a few lines, or simply close their eyes, swaying slightly in rhythmic consonance with the melody and the words that filled the air. It was Elul, before the war, in a dirt-road village in early-20th-century Poland, and everyone needed to prepare for the holy days.

Now, the quiet, curly-haired man was no longer an apprentice. He was an accomplished tailor in his own right. For the past seven years, since his arrival in Canada from the displaced persons camp in Germany, he operated a sewing machine in a garment factory in the heart of Yiddish-speaking Toronto at Spadina and College streets. He was paid on a piecework basis, receiving a few pennies for each garment component (piece) he produced for the factory owner.

It was before Rosh Hashanah, and he was determined to work even harder and faster than normal, because he knew there would be no income on the days he would soon be spending in synagogue. Moreover, he was unable to accept any overtime that month, because he was a member of a three-man High Holiday choir that rehearsed in the evenings. Though in fact, it was truer to say, because the other two men in the choir were also recent arrivals from eastern Europe, the "rehearsals" were less practice sessions than they were emotional reminiscences of the life and the people they had lost barely a decade ago.

There was also the clamouring from his five-year-old boy. Lately, the youngster had latched on to the idea that he needed a cowboy suit. Repeatedly, he asked his father to buy him the same cowboy gear that his friends had. No logic or reasoning, gentle persuasion or finger-wagging hectoring from the boy's wiser, older sister could make the child understand the spare nature of his parents' economic situation, let alone persuade him to abandon any hope of owning his own cowboy outfit.

It was an arduous and, one must add, sentimental time for the tailor. Three or four nights each week, in the cooler breezes of the early September evenings, he walked to choir rehearsal. Familiar tunes hung in the air, but he always walked alone. The night before Rosh Hashanah, the five-year-old couldn't believe his eyes.

Propped up against the starched cotton cover of the punched-in feather pillow, more lovely and more radiant than sunshine in February, were two Hop-Along Cassidy six-shooters, a Lone Ranger mask and a Roy Rogers hat.

The quiet, curly-haired tailor was ready now for Rosh Hashanah.

BRONFMAN PRIZE CEREMONIES

Supreme Court Justice Rosalie Silverman Abella spoke at the recent Charles Bronfman Prize ceremonies in Tel Aviv. Israeli educator Karen Tal (not pictured) received the $100,000 award for her work with disadvantaged youth in Israel. Abella, a member of the judging panel, said that "the values that Karen has donated... to these children and to this country are exactly the values Charles Bronfman has spent his entire life endlessly promoting – education, generosity, tolerance, fairness, respect, and dignity." The prize is a humanitarian award that celebrates the vision and endeavour of an individual or team, under 50 years of age, whose humanitarian work has contributed significantly to the betterment of the world.

El Al, Westjet ink deal to co-operate on flights

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

El Al Israel Airlines and WestJet have entered an agreement designed to facilitate travel from Canadian cities to Israel while boosting tourism by Israelis to destinations reached by WestJet.

The agreement was finalized in Israel on Sept. 12 at a signing ceremony attended by WestJet president and CEO Gregg Saretsky and El AL president and CEO Elyezer Shkady.

The deal, know as an "interline agreement," should make it easier for travel agents across Canada to sell Israel as a destination, said Dinah Kutner, general manager of El Al's Canadian office. Under the new arrangement, passengers will be able to seamlessly book travel to Israel from locations outside Toronto.

A traveller in Vancouver or Calgary, for example, will be able to book a flight on WestJet to Toronto, El Al's only Canadian destination, and then on El Al to Israel. They will be issued one ticket, and their baggage will automatically be transferred to El Al's aircraft in Toronto, Kutner said.

Prior to the agreement, passengers or their travel agents would have to book flights to Toronto separately on WestJet or another airline, and transfer their baggage in Toronto. This cost El Al business as some passengers chose other carriers or travelled via Europe instead, Kutner said.

With the interline agreement in place, travellers can book their own flights online or through an agent, she added.

The new arrangement should pay off for El Al pretty quickly. Kutner is forecasting a substantial boost in traffic almost immediately.

"We're looking incrementally, and trying to be conservative, but we're looking at a 10 to 15 per cent increase [of revenue] in the first year," she said.

In particular, El Al is expecting to make inroads on passenger traffic to Israel from Montreal. There's a substantial Jewish population in the Montreal/Ottawa corridor, and "people have wanted to fly El Al," she said. Many have opted for the convenience of a single carrier – Air Canada – or gone via Europe, she said.

"If our fares are competitive, we can get that business," she added.

El Al is also eyeing Israeli passengers as another source of growth, Kutner continued. "We can bring Israelis to Canada using Toronto as a hub and from there to [Canadian cities], Mexico, the Caribbean, the United States, everywhere WestJet flies."

The potential in that market is substantial, as "Israelis are interested in the world. They love to travel," Kutner said.

"A big part of the business is expected from Israel."

WestJet is also pleased with the agreement with El Al.

"Interline agreements are important to airlines such as WestJet, because they help bring guests into our network, without us having to use our own aircraft to do it," said Robert Palmer, WestJet's manager of public relations.

"Foreign carriers with whom we have interline and code-sharing agreements will transport guests to Canadian soil, and then WestJet will fly them on the final leg of their journey to their ultimate destination. In addition to channeling more guests into our network from abroad, these types of agreements also offer WestJet important exposure to audiences who may not otherwise know about us."

Kutner conceded that WestJet, Canada's second-largest airline, isn't well known in Israel currently, but El Al is working to increase its exposure there.

"We'll develop the WestJet brand in Israel," she said. "Stanley Morais is spreading the word."

Morais is the former general manager of El Al's office in Canada and, after making aliyah, serves as the airline's head of corporate division.

"We are proud to partner with WestJet," said Shkady during the signing ceremony. "This agreement with WestJet provides various options to our Israeli and Canadian customers and is a continuation of the El Al strategy in expanding commercial agreements, both interline and code-shares, with leading carriers around the world."

Kutner said the airlines are working at expanding the relationship to include code-sharing. Under that arrangement, airlines would be able to sell tickets on each other's flights and put their own airline code – LY for El Al, WS for WestJet – on tickets all the way from point of origin to final destination.

"That would get better visibility and is more user friendly for those doing bookings and the airlines. It also makes it easier to sell the product," Kutner said.

During the high season summer months, from the end of June to early September, El Al offered five weekly flights to and from Israel. For the rest of the year, the airline has scheduled three flights a week to Israel.

"We had a good summer," Kutner said. "Our fall and winter numbers are far exceeding our expectations."

El Al reported running at 83 per cent capacity for the year to September.

Common history

We ask Him to "grant us peace, goodness, blessing, grace, kindness and mercy." It is the soldier and the countless other young soldiers of the Israeli Defence Forces who provide the peace, goodness and blessing that comprise the sum of the security for the people of Israel for which we pray.

The combined symbols of the young man, his uniform, the shofar in his hand and the place at which he stands lift off the passages of our prayers in modern embodiment of the common history that brings us to Rosh Hashanah.

We are as much within this image as the history and image are within us.

So, too, are we at the Rosh Hashanah table of Noam and Aviva Schalit, seen so forlorn and sorrowful in the photo at the lower left. The sign over the empty chair beside them tells us they have remained "awake through the night." And we know, alas, that their night has thus far lasted more than five years and three months. The chair is "reserved for [their son] Gilad Schalit."

To whom have the Schalits not turned in their desperate effort to obtain their son's freedom from Hamas kidnaptivity? Earlier this month, they travelled to New York asking members of the United Nations to have Gilad's fate in mind.

We must be especially attuned to the fact that the prayers we will read over the next few days also resonate with special hope for the seeming hopelessness of the Schalit family's plight.

"There is hope for our future," the prophet Jeremiah tells us on the second day of the holiday. "Our sons will return to their homes."

We, who are joined to the Schalit family by common celebration and common history, join also in their plight. When we hear the shofar, let us think of them. When we look around us during the holiday at the large and diverse assembly of fellow Jews, let us recall that they are included in the assembly. In the words that Hannah spoke to Eli the priest that we read on the first day of the holiday, Noam and Aviva Schalit have "spilled their souls before God."

But their souls are not yet empty. Nor must they ever become empty.

May the sum of all of our experiences in the days that follow – the prayers we utter, the songs we sing, the memories of the people we miss, the quiet moments we cherish, the shofar blasts we hear – help stitch the seams of that special feeling of peoplehood that bind us and have bound us together in strength and purpose for the past many thousand years.

An Israeli court indicted retired Cleveland-area autoworker John Demjanjuk, 66, on war crime charges, alleging that he gassed thousands of Jews as a Nazi death camp guard at Treblinka called "Ivan the Terrible." The United States had extradited Demjanjuk to Israel seven months earlier.

Turning reality on its head

In his letter, Peter P. Farkas turns reality on its head ("Palestinian independence, Sept. 15). It is the Palestinians who continually build road blocks with their pre-conditions: 1967 "borders," return of millions of "refugees" to Israel proper, refusal to acknowledge that a final agreement will signify the end of all negotiations, and more. Farkas' first objection – to the insistence on Palestinian recognition of Israel as Jewish state – is the most astonishing. The Palestinians could have had a state of their own at any time since 1937. They refused in 1948, did not ask for one between 1948 and 1967 when they were governed by Jordan and Egypt, refused the return of all the lands conquered in 1967 with the notorious Khartoum "three noes," refused at Camp David in 2000 and refused again in 2008 when out-going Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert offered them just about everything. In every case, they refused, because it would have meant accepting a Jewish state in their midst. As Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said, it will take just six words from PA President Mahmoud Abbas to create peace: "I will accept a Jewish state."

Organization needs name change

It is a pity that after 90 years of advocacy on behalf of Canadian Jewry and Israel, the Canadian Jewish Congress exists in name only, and its vital role has been taken over by the recently created Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). This new name is less impressive than "Canadian Jewish Congress" and sounds more like a private think-tank rather than a national organization representing Canadian Jewry. It is unlikely the new leaders will admit their mistake in rejecting the choice they had of keeping the traditional name, but at least they should consider calling themselves the Canadian Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs so people will know it is not American.

Anti-Israel rally

Despite the claims of the United Church of Canada that Karin Brothers was at an anti-Israel al-Quds rally at Queen's Park in her personal capacity and not as a representative of the United Church of Canada, the church never distanced itself from these haters of Israel ("United Church clarifies member's role at rally," Sept. 15). I noticed that the United Church did not condemn the words spoken at the rally, and that is to be expected based on their past and current record of Palestinian activism and supporting the enemies of Israel against Jewish people.

Although some of our community leaders have pandered to this church to get it to cease and desist its activism against Israel, it was a failure. I suggest that in the future, activists be encouraged to give the hateful politics of churches, unions and Islamist groups the same kind of medicine that they dish out.

Israeli policies

The policies of the present Israeli government, both words and actions, have alienated much of the rest of the world to a degree that one has never previously seen ("Palestinians' UN plan won't succeed," Perspectives, Sept. 1). The Israeli government basically rejects the long and widely accepted basis for an ultimate peace between Israel and the Palestinians – 1967 borders with land swaps, a Palestinian capital in east Jerusalem and extremely limited right of return.

A bar mitzvah for a disabled child

I want to offer congratulations and mazal tov to Rabbi Adam Cutler of Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto for enabling a disabled bright child to study and celebrate his bar mitzvah despite the troubling side effects of Asperger's syndrome. Rabbi Cutler and his family have a long and ongoing association with Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation in Toronto, where they witnessed the works of the late Rabbi Joseph Kelman, the first rabbi known to create programs for children with disabilities enabling them to celebrate bar and bat mitzvot along with their families and congregations.

Israel-bashers disappointed by U.S. stance

Israel Harel
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Some Israeli circles that have influence in this country – and, to a not inconsequential degree, also abroad – blame all the illnesses of the region, and a great deal beyond, on the Jewish-Zionist state. For many months, they sowed fear and anxiety in anticipation of "September." And not only did they warn of the impending "gloomy reality," they made efforts to advance it.

And the heads of the Israeli administration against whom this psychological warfare was waged on a personal basis started to panic. For example, Defence Minister Ehud Barak defined what was expected at the United Nations as a "tsunami." It is, therefore, not surprising that considerable sections of the public were also infected with panic.

U.S. President Barack Obama

But now that it seems that their expectations are going to be disappointed and their state is going to get out of this assault on it with minimum damage, their faces have fallen. The experts, analysts and other prophets of doom are now expressing mourning and sorrow. The hurricane that they had predicted – in fact, that they started – has turned into a seasonal storm of the type we have learned to live with, apparently not so badly, since we became a state.

But their greatest disappointment is from the "helpless" U.S. president who "lacks vision," who until a few days ago was a resolute prophet – even a god – in their eyes, a man of ingenuity and vision. Lo and behold, that same Barack Obama whom their mouthpieces cheered when he stated "next year we can have an agreement that will bring a new member to the UN," has become – with one tepid pro-Israel speech – the man "who is likely to pave the way to a regional uprising!"

But that is the way of those Israelis. Instead of thanking him for standing alongside our country this time, even with certain reservations, their sarcastic reaction is that he is "a good Jerusalem boy." Because, after all, "the Jewish vote and money call the tune." And that was written neither by an Arab commentator, nor an antisemite from Europe.

A speech with vision, it transpires, is an event where Israel is placed on the bench of the world's accused, as those who sowed panic had hoped, while the president of the United States reads out the charge sheet against it. But when he turns to the Israelis, and no less so to the Palestinians, with wooing words, their frustration increases. "Our situation has never been so wretched." Really!

And there is yet another disappointment – the demonstrations in Judea and Samaria have not reached the proportions that were allotted them. This time, contrary to the war of terror that ran rampage between 2000 and 2005 (and as a result of the Oslo processes that were the brainchild of those circles that now are rebuking Obama), Jews will apparently not be murdered en masse in shopping malls, on buses, in coffee shops and in ambushes on the roads.

Israel has many troubles, and those at the helm right now can be accused of responsibility for part of them. But to put most of the responsibility on them for the Palestinians' refusal, for the reckless freedom that the Turkish prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, has granted to his country's imperialistic megalomania, and for the mass expressions of hatred for Israel and Jews in Egypt and Jordan, is a combination of lack of intellectual honesty and the prolonged hatred for two people – Barak and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu – that nurtures it.

It was not "Jewish money" that caused Obama to change his tone. In Washington, unlike in Tel Aviv, people reassessed the situation and reached the conclusion that even – or expressly – "the Arab Spring" has proven that in the Middle East, it is not possible to rely on any Muslim ally. But Israel – even we have forgotten this – is an island of stability in a violent and fanatical region that has ill feelings about democracy, human rights, and freedom of information and ritual.

From the north of Africa to the depths of Asia there are those who threaten not only the existence of the Jewish state but also the security of the free world. And, therefore, even though this makes certain circles in Israel so upset, Obama's speech at the United Nations is the exact opposite of weakness and lack of vision.

Obama tells Arab world to get real

Ron Kampeas
JTA

Was it a speech to help launch his campaign for re-election, or an address to bury hopes for immediate Palestinian statehood recognition?

Both assessments marked the immediate reaction to U.S. President Barack Obama's Sept. 21 speech at the United Nations General Assembly, and there was ammunition for both arguments. But both also may have missed the point: the speech smacked of what has become an Obama specialty: the "get real speech."

In this case, his target appeared to be the United Nations and its constituent members. The bottom line of the Israeli-Palestinian portion of the speech – 635 words out of 4,500 – was that dismissing real Israeli concerns about security was not a good way to restart Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

"The Jewish people have forged a successful state in their historic homeland. Israel deserves recognition," Obama said after outlining the array of threats that Israelis have faced in recent years, including rocket attacks and suicide bombers. "It deserves normal relations with its neighbours. And friends of the Palestinians do them no favours by ignoring this truth, just as friends of Israel must recognize the need to pursue a two-state solution with a secure Israel next to an independent Palestine."

This Obama characteristic – presenting himself as a truth teller – has rankled rivals. Some critics in the United States and Israel have described it as arrogance.

But in the context of the Palestinian efforts last week to achieve statehood recognition, there was only gratitude from Israeli and Jewish leaders, who thanked Obama for making it clear to the assembled world leaders that pre-emptive Palestinian statehood would not get anywhere.

"You've also made it clear that the Palestinians deserve a state, but it's a state that has to make that peace with Israel," Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said at an appearance with Obama after the president delivered the speech. "And, therefore, their attempt to shortcut this process, not negotiate a peace – that attempt to get membership, state membership in the United Nations – will not succeed."

The speech was underpinned by U.S. efforts to draw away enough votes to make a difference on the issue of statehood recognition for the Palestinians. If fewer than nine of the 15 UN Security Council nations vote for statehood, the United States would not have to exercise its veto in the council. If the Palestinians attempt to achieve enhanced status through the General Assembly, they will likely gain the necessary majority – but votes against or abstentions by European and western nations would rob them of a moral victory.

"If the Palestinians are truly serious about a viable two-state deal, they should stop the counterproductive brinksmanship at the UN and return to the negotiating table now," said David Harris, the director of the American Jewish Committee.

Harris and his counterparts at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, the Anti-Defamation League and B'nai B'rith International all praised Obama's speech.

Advocates of greater pressure on Netanyahu to make concessions to the Palestinians said Obama's speech reeked of electioneering at a time when the Obama campaign is trying to reach out to the Jewish community to stanch the loss of Jewish support.

Others detected a note of despair from a president who has tried from his first day in office to restart talks.

"Regrettably, the president's words offered very little in the way of hope to Israelis and Palestinians," Americans for Peace Now said. "The United States cannot maintain credibility as the standard-bearer of rights and freedoms while the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is left to fester."

Obama prides himself, perhaps to a fault, on telling his listeners what he considers to be uncomfortable truths.

He unsettled Arab listeners in his June 2009 Cairo speech by lecturing them about the futility of Holocaust denial. People involved in crafting that speech have said there was a recognition that the Muslim world anticipated a love fest, but that the president thought it important to address what he sees an obstacle to Muslim-western reconciliation.

Likewise, when Obama spoke to the annual AIPAC conference in May, he reiterated his call from several days earlier calling on Israel to negotiate on the basis of the 1967 lines, with mutually agreed swaps. Many conference-goers had hoped Obama would offer a more conciliatory speech to the pro-Israel crowd.

The Washington Convention Center fell silent when the president outlined a bleak future should Israel not come to the talks table and implicitly criticized Netanyahu for offering too little to make a difference.

"The march to isolate Israel internationally – and the impulse of the Palestinians to abandon negotiations – will continue to gain momentum in the absence of a credible peace process and alternative," Obama said. "And for us to have leverage with the Palestinians, to have leverage with the Arab states and with the international community, the basis for negotiations has to hold out the prospect of success."

At the United Nations last week, however, Obama focused on what the Palestinians and the Arab world need to offer the Israelis: security assurances.

'Let us be loving, hopeful and optimistic'

This past year, the world seems to have changed. Nations rise up against dictators; Israel struggles to find its way; America falls deeper into political and economic crisis. Not even little Canada is living up to its ideals.

Too, we recently experienced the 10th anniversary of 9-11, an event that truly changed the world – and not for the better. The memories left our emotions raw.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

This newspaper arrives in your homes just before the first night of Rosh Hashanah. Every year the services themselves are the same. It is we who, each year, encounter them in a different frame of mind.

This year, I see a darker frame.

Those who know me well know that I like an intimate, participatory service. A service where the congregation sings the responses, the cantor (and sometimes choir) leading without dictating or dominating. A service in which we create an atmosphere of joyful praise together.

But this year I want pomp, ceremony. I want theatre. I want to be carried along, to be led. I feel exhausted; maybe that is what the prophet meant when he said his spirit was poured out like water. I will bring to a shared worship neither the spiritual nor the physical ability to participate. Too many losses this year of dear friends; too many dark events, too many reminders of the fragility of human life, and the ease with which a seemingly civil society can lose its way.

Too many starving in front of our eyes, kept from the food that would save them. Too many hate-filled crowds, too few ready to speak up for what is right. Great democracies like America and Israel appear at a loss how to react to rapid changes of today's realities.

Poet William Butler Yeats had it cold: "The best lack all conviction/The worst are full of passionate intensity."

He was describing a society in terrible crisis. If our situation is not so dire, surely we are not so smug as to ignore the great challenges we face, in the environment and in social programs that are our national pride, just to name a few.

Rabbi Dov Peretz Elkins, in Rosh Hashanah Readings, cites Arthur Waskow in the following short essay.

"Arthur Waskow has pointed out that inside the walls of the Old City near the Jaffa Gate, there is an ancient block of stone. It is a very busy place, and most people rush by. But if you stop and look closely [we have, many times] you can see carved on that stone, the letters LEG X. That stone is a relic of Titus' 10th Roman Legion, the legion that destroyed Jerusalem and our temple almost 2,000 years ago.

"Recently something most interesting has happened to that block of Roman stone. It has been recycled and now serves as a base for a homely, ordinary street lamp. Waskow observes, 'Giving light: a strange renewal of the old menorah. And a strange reversal of the Arch of Titus; where the arch turned the light from the menorah into stone, this street lamp turns the stone back into light. Light to live by.'"

Elkins goes on to comment, "That is the eternal task of our people – to keep turning stone back into light. And that is what this Rosh Hashanah, the birthday of the world, comes to tell us. A new year has been born and is waiting to be shaped by us into a season of healing, for ourselves and those we love, but not only for them."

My hope is that throughout the holidays we will experience a sense of the possibility of healing from the wounds of our personal tragedies, and that we may somehow begin to rebuild confidence in democracy, to overcome the blows that it has sustained. To find new light to live by.

When the moment comes when we lift our spirits and voices to welcome a new year, and turn our thoughts to being better people in the next year, I will remind myself of the words of the late New Democratic Party leader Jack Layton in his farewell letter to all Canadians:

"My friends love is better than anger. Hope is better than fear. Optimism is better than despair. So let us be loving, hopeful and optimistic. And we'll change the world."

Shanah Tovah.

Rabbi Dov Peretz Elkins

Do we need memorials?

My husband had a stroke and my world shifted.

Things will never be the same. Yet in many ways, things haven't changed. I still go to work, eat, sleep (admittedly not enough), go to the gym, watch TV and generally behave like I used to. But my husband is not at my side as I walk on the mountain. He is my partner, but our partnering has taken on a new direction. I must do my jobs and his jobs. But for how long? The shape of our union is uncertain, and so I'm unable to clearly state that my life has changed. It has, but I'm not sure in what direction or what is "forever."

Recently, we all watched and joined in the commemorations for the 10th anniversary of 9-11. I argued with some friends that we, the world, had not been changed by those events. Let me explain.

Immediately after the event, we were all horrified and moved. We were definitely changed and felt both personally involved and vulnerable. Yet after 10 years, I felt all that was left was anger at the silly airport restrictions and invasive security protocols. It was annoying, not terrifying, to fly. Terrorists were the TV boogie men, not imminent happenings.

Friends disagreed. So I rethought my premises. Surely, those primarily affected – the families of the 3,000, the rescuers, the firefighters and police authorities – were all personally involved and have been deeply transformed. But what about the rest of us? Are we so superficial a species that we can only care if we are personally involved? Or do we maintain interest only for a few years and then neglect or forget the incident?

Who are we when it comes to trauma and transformation? Both on a national level and a personal one, how long do we hold on or respond to catastrophe? How are we changed on a daily basis? From 9-11 to my husband's stroke, what changes us and what doesn't?

I remember the assassination of U.S. president John F. Kennedy. It did move me and change the way I understood American politics and the national dream. I no longer took my vote for granted. I no longer thought the same way about politicians.

Some events do change us. So what about 9-11?

After the memorials and all the TV and print attention, I had a new understanding. The events themselves aren't sufficient to alter our perceptions and identities. Rather, it's through the process of commemorative celebration that we weave our transformed character and approach to the events. Without those memorials, memory dies and the event itself loses its transformative power in our lives.

Anniversaries are very important, because they reflect, respond to, shape, and confirm our sense of something important having happened. If we, the community or its representatives, pronounce an event historic, then it is. If we remain silent, silence prevails, and the event is forgotten. So it is for our stories about ourselves.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

History is important. It's the collection of our signalling to ourselves of those moments of collective and personal transformative events. Sing a song, write a tale, create a ritual, blow out a candle – then we'll know we were moved by something important.

Back to 9-11 and my own personal tragedy. Yes, I do suppose the world has been changed by the terrorist attacks of that September day. I will insist on calling them terrorist attacks and will reject those who wish to clean up the story and call them "events" for fear of prejudice and interethnic tension. If we remember, we must remember things as they were.

The outpouring of reports and testimony proves that Americans and the global community were affected and require the memorial route to keep that message alive. Remember those who died, innocents who were victims, and be vigilant so that it will never happen again.

And what of our own personal trauma? We will forever be different. My husband, in this new state has uttered some incredible truths. He told me: there is no Howard without Norma. So we are a new unit, balancing on each other in a new way. I have to get used to it. Obviously, he's ahead of me, as usual. I have to celebrate this anniversary properly.

German identity eludes Jews in Germany

A flavour of the strong, unabashed sense of German identity that German Jews once generally revelled in is found in two grainy and nostalgic black-and-white photographs displayed in an exhibit in Berlin's Jewish Museum.

The photographs, symbolic of patriotism unbound, show two Jewish males in German army uniforms. The first one portrays a soldier in a spiked Prussian helmet proudly riding off to war on a horse in 1914. The second one depicts a soldier in battle gear standing tall in France in 1917.

When World War I broke out, German Jews rallied to the colours to do their duty. In disproportionate numbers, 100,000 Jewish men enlisted in the German armed forces. When the carnage ended four years later, 12,000 Jewish soldiers had been killed in the fighting.

During the postwar Weimar Republic, when 564,000 Jews lived in Germany, Jews made stellar contributions to German society, even though they represented less than one per cent of its overall population.

Jews, having been at last granted civic rights in the last half of the 19th century as the Germanic states and principalities coalesced into one united nation, considered themselves Germans to the core.

Antisemitism, fanned by the dark forces of right-wing nationalists who falsely blamed Jews for Germany's ignominious defeat in the war ("the stab in the back" myth), persisted. Jews faced job restrictions in various professions and state institutions.

Cilly Kugelmann

The rise of Nazism in 1933 swept away illusions and notions of a German-Jewish symbiosis. A succession of antisemitic edicts disenfranchised Jews, while Kristallnacht in 1938 sealed their fate.

German Jews emigrated en masse. Those who could not or would not leave were deported and murdered in concentration camps. Several thousand German Jews survived, either in hiding or in protected marriages to Christians. Many Jews of partial Christian ancestry, or mischlings, survived as well.

After World War II, an exodus of displaced eastern and central European Jews, mainly from Poland, Romania and Hungary, streamed into occupied Germany. Sitting on their suitcases and expecting to leave, they never really felt like German Jews. They were simply Jews in Germany. The distinction was important.

On the eve of Germany's re-

unification in 1990, 30,000 Jews, registered with the community, resided in Germany, mostly in the western half. A small minority were yekkes, the endangered species from the pre-Nazi period known as German Jews.

Today, thanks to an influx of about 200,000 Soviet nationals into Germany since the fall of Communism – some Jewish, some of partial Jewish ancestry and some the Christian relatives of Jewish immigrants – the official figure has risen to 120,000.

By all accounts, 80 per cent or more of the Jews in Germany today hail from the former Soviet Union. By government design, they are scattered throughout Germany's 16 states. Generally unemployed because their grasp of German is limited and their academic credentials have not been recognized, older Russian immigrants are dependent on welfare and have, in effect, fallen through the cracks.

The largest community is in Berlin, the lively, cosmopolitan capital that once had 180,000 Jewish inhabitants. Berlin's Jewish community, numbering 10,500 at last count and financially supported by the city senate to the tune of about 20 million Euros annually, is thriving institutionally due to its wide array of schools, synagogues, clubs and agencies.

In actual fact, Berlin's Jewish population is considerably larger if you include non-registered Soviet Jews, Jewish Communists from the now-defunct German Democratic Republic, Jews holding foreign passports and a colony of about 10,000 Israelis, noted Deidre Berger, director of the American Jewish Committee office in Berlin.

Since 2005, following the passage of new government regulations, immigration from the former Soviet Union has slowed to a trickle. Germany enacted the regulations to appease Israel and to calm local Jewish leaders, who complained that they could not properly absorb so many newcomers so quickly.

Berlin's Jewish community is thus expected to experience a numerical decline. "At the moment, we have many more deaths than births," said Lala Susskind, chair of the community.

Given their external origins and the spectre of the Nazi past, the Jewish denizens of Berlin do not in general identify themselves as Germans per se. Take Susskind, for example.

Born in 1946 in a displaced persons camp in Germany, and the daughter of Polish Jewish survivors who thought they would eventually settle in South America, Susskind describes herself as "a Jew living in Berlin" rather than a German Jew.

Juliane Wetzel

Like her parents, she has not acquired German citizenship and, being married to an Austrian, she holds a foreign passport. Susskind, who spoke Polish and Yiddish as a child at home and once entertained the idea of making aliyah to Israel, is not certain whether her grown children feel German. "I haven't asked them," she claimed. "I don't want them to feel uncomfortable."

Berger, an American who has been in Germany since 1984 and has a German husband, observed that identification with Germany is much stronger among second- and third-generation Jews. "They've gone through the school system and speak German fluently."

Cilly Kugelmann, the associate and program director of the Jewish Museum, was born in postwar Germany, the scion of Polish Jews. In common with the vast majority of Jews in contemporary Germany, she is ambivalent about her nationality.

"I'm a citizen of the Federal Republic of Germany," she mused. "For me, it's too early to use the term 'German' with a deeper content. I say, 'I come from Germany.' I personally don't know Jews here who can say, 'I'm a German.'"

Nonetheless, according to Berger, Jews in Germany are far more accepted than ethnic Turks, who comprise a large portion of Germany's estimated four million Muslims. "Jews fit into modern bourgeois life more easily than Turks," she explained.

Yet antisemitism, deeply ingrained in western Christian societies, lingers on.

Juliane Wetzel, a historian at the Centre for Research on Antisemitism at the Technical University, believes that 15 to 20 percent of Germans hold antisemitic attitudes and cling to classical stereotypes. But Nazi-style antisemitism, based on racism, appears to have vanished.

Anti-Jewish Germans are usually 60 and above, live in rural areas and inhabit society's lower socio-economic rungs, she noted.

They sympathize with the platform of the far-right National Democratic Party, which, though shut out in the federal parliament, has won a handful of seats in state legislatures. The NDP, while fundamentally antisemitic, couches its views in bland language so as to avoid prosecution by the state.

Citing a recent study, Wetzel – one of the authors of a parliamentary report on antisemitism slated to be issued in November – said that anti-Islamic feeling in Germany today is stronger than antisemitism. As for Holocaust denial, it remains a marginal phenomenon.

PM's wife receives Award of Valour

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies honoured Laureen Harper, the prime minister's wife, with an Award of Valour last week during a lavish luncheon at the Ritz Carlton in Toronto.

Nearly 500 people attended the sold-out event, which also featured a keynote lecture by Aayan Hirsi Ali, the Somali-born political activist, author, feminist, and former Dutch politician who is an outspoken critic of radical Islam.

Senator Linda Frum, who co-chaired the event, took to the podium to introduce Canada's first lady.

"The poem from which this award takes its inspiration, attributed to King Solomon, praises a woman of valour as one who is righteous, energetic and capable. And also as a woman whose husband's heart relies on her. How exact a description of Laureen," Frum said.

Frum listed Harper's accomplishments, including her work with the Canadian Red Cross, her involvement with the Run for the Cure in support of breast cancer research, the Military Family Fund of Canada, the Humane Society and for her "vocal and fearless support of Israel."

She also highlighted her role in initiating a campaign to save the life of Sakineh Mohammadi Ashtiani, an Iranian woman who was sentenced to death for allegedly committing adultery.

Harper said she was humbled to find herself in the company of previous recipients of the award, including philanthropists Rosalie Sharp and Carole Grafstein.

Using that platform to raise awareness about the plight of Ashtiani, Harper said, "I would encourage everyone to sign the international online petition calling for freedom for Sakineh…

"Her conviction was a legal travesty. Her imprisonment and torture are gross violations of basic human rights and her sentence to death by stoning – by stoning – is an act of pure barbarism," Harper added.

"When the whole world is watching, not even the worst dictators can ignore that."

Harper also paid tribute to Hirsi Ali, who she called "the most valorous woman in the room today."

"I know many smart women. I know many clever women, but how many are brave?"

Hirsi Ali, who was raised Muslim, grew up in Somalia and Saudi Arabia until she moved to the Netherlands in 1992 to escape a forced marriage to a distant cousin.

She became a politician and was voted into the Dutch parliament. Hirsi Ali gained both notoriety and admiration when she denounced Islam following the Sept. 11 attacks, and later, wrote the script for a documentary called Submission, which was critical of the treatment of women in Islamic society.

The film's director, Theo van Gogh, was murdered by a Muslim extremist who pinned a death threat for Hirsi Ali to van Gogh's body with a knife.

She currently lives in the United States, where she founded the Aha Foundation dedicated to helping women in Islamic societies.

Hirsi Ali, who began her keynote speech with praise for Harper, said, "I've met princesses and wives of politicians and first ladies, but it is unique in a time of political correctness for a woman to stand up and use her position to empower others…

"Tell me about another first lady or princess or politician's wife who wrote a letter to [Iranian president] Mahmoud Ahmadinejad."

Touching on Friends of Simon Wiesenthal's (FSWC's) mission to rid the world of intolerance in general and antisemitism specifically, she spoke about herself, as a young girl, before she decided to "emancipate" herself from her religious background.

"Before I assumed my own life and left my destiny in my hands, I was an antisemite. I didn't know that I was an antisemite because that was the general attitude.

It was in our prayers, in our textbooks, in our conversations. Everywhere around me, it was absolutely normal to hate Jews, to blame Jews for everything that went wrong," she said.

She recalled that when her mother would turn on the tap in the kitchen, if the water wouldn't run, she'd curse the Jews.

"With her frustration, my mother's comment was, 'It's the Jews, they're at it again.'"

Hirsi Ali, who now dedicates much of her time to empowering Muslim women living in oppressive societies, said there are three types of Muslim women.

"One is educated, has the opportunity to get an education and has her family's support."

She said these women say that is how most Muslim women live, but in reality they represent the lucky few.

The second type submits to the men in their lives, they are voiceless, and "colourless" because they are covered from head to toe in dark robes.

"Their mode of survival is to comply... In the 21st century, the majority of Muslim women live like that."

The third type, whom Hirsi Ali calls "the engines of change," challenge the men in their lives about the fact that they are treated differently than their brothers, that they are not permitted to go to school.

She said she dedicates her life to emancipating Muslim women because "in the long run... it is going to do wonders for tolerance in the world."

FSWC CEO and president Avi Benlolo warned the gathering that "extremism prevails," and that there are more than four billion people "who are living in unfree societies."

He said although Canada is "a beacon of freedom," it still suffers from intolerance and Jews are the most targeted group in Canada.

"We have to educate as many people as possible and we have to do it fast."

Benlolo said one of the ways his organization tries to educate youth is through Freedom Day, held at Yonge Dundas Square in Toronto.

Last week, retired Canadian general Romeo Dallaire addressed more than 3,000 students at the event, challenging them to "change the world."

Michel Chikwanine, a former child soldier from the Democratic Republic of Congo, spoke on behalf of the innumerable child soldiers who can't speak for themselves.

"I can use my story to mobilize young people to tell my story and to fight for the freedom we have in Canada," Chikwanine said.

Islamism abuses women, panel says

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Canadian women were urged to speak out against Islamism at a panel discussion last week presented by the Advocates for Civil Liberties and the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association.

The Sept. 19 panel, titled "Islamism's War on Women," was held at the Toronto Heliconian Club and moderated by Barbara Kay, a columnist for the National Post.

The speakers were Raheel Raza, a Muslim Canadian journalist, author, anti-racism activist and founder of Forum for Learning, an organization that promotes knowledge and learning in the fields of cultural and religious diversity; Marina Nemat, an author of two books chronicling her experience as a teenager imprisoned in Tehran during the Iranian revolution, and Natasha Fatah, a Muslim Canadian journalist and producer.

Fatah, who was born in Pakistan and lived as a child in Saudi Arabia, said that while Islam is a religion, Islamism is an ideology that creeps in in sneaky ways. "It misrepresents the faith. It is a cancer, an enemy that is spreading, and we have to stop it."

Islamism always comes down to control of a body, "and nine times out of 10, it is a woman's body. Physical bodies have become the battleground for political ideology, and that is not right," she said.

Raza, who grew up in Pakistan, said that she has "absolutely no doubt that God did not create women to be mistreated. The concepts have been twisted."

She said that in Pakistan between 1998 and 2003, there were 4,000 "honour killings" of women. "In Jordan and Lebanon, the perpetrators of 70 to 75 per cent of the honour killings were the women's brothers."

Fatah said that domestic violence as we know it here is between intimate partners who have issues. "It is a different phenomenon. Honour killing is a strategy that is planned out. It is a political issue, and it is culturally and religiously sanctioned."

Nemat, a Christian born in Iran, said that growing up in a country that was 98 per cent Muslim, she never experienced discrimination. "I danced, read what I want, and listened to music. Then the revolution took place. Suddenly we had all these rules. Dancing and singing became illegal, and we were told to wear the hijab."

After waves of arrests began, she said, she was arrested at age 16 and spent two years in jail.

She said that in prison, there was a phenomenon called temporary marriage.

"You could be married off for a day, or even an hour. I was married off to a guard, and he threatened to arrest my parents and boyfriend if I resisted," Nemat said.

"This situation continues in Iran as we speak, and I am grateful that I can bear witness. I'm here, but I carry the memories of the girls [who died in prison.]"

She said that even in Canada, "we have to pay attention to the danger signs. Religion is private and should remain at home. Sharia law wants to control, and that is not OK. It has nothing to do with religion. It is a way for a small group to gain power and run everything. It is being sold in the name of religion."

Fatah said people would not have left Iran if they loved what was happening there. "We came here for freedom, for justice, and for a voice. We wanted to be left alone to practise what religion we wanted."

Raza urged Canadians to stand up for their rights. "Do not let political correctness hold you back from speaking out. You have to stand up for truth and justice, just as you would stand up for Israel."

Rosh Hashanah greeting from Mayor Rob Ford

As members of the Jewish faith here in Toronto and around the world gather to celebrate the High Holidays, I want to take this opportunity to extend my warmest wishes for this new year. Shanah Tovah Umetukah. May you have a good, sweet new year.

Rosh Hashanah marks the start of a new year. A time of humble prayer, joyful celebration and hope for a new beginning. As we begin this new year, it is more important than ever to believe in the power of compassion. It's up to us to stand as a symbol of hope and tolerance, and embrace the diversity that has always made our wonderful city stronger.

On behalf of my family, Toronto city council and the residents of Toronto, I would like to wish you a Happy and Sweet New Year.

Rabbi Moshe Steiner, centre, and his mother, Sherryl Steiner, showed Toronto Mayor Rob Ford the symbols of Rosh Hashanah. The mayor made a YouTube video extending holiday greetings to the Jewish community.

Shana Tova, From Our Home to Yours

Camp Moshava celebrates 50 years

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

In celebration of Camp Moshava's 50th anniversary, a gala dinner will be held at On the Park on Nov. 28 to honour many of the people who have made the camp memorable and meaningful over the decades.

Proceeds from the event will help secure the future of Camp Moshava Ennismore, located near Peterborough, Ont., as a place where Jewish children are inspired to love Israel, said Jeffery Silver, a Moshava camper for seven years and a staff member for four years.

The Orthodox camp is committed to improving its infrastructure and programs, with an immediate goal of replacing some aging facilities. Currently, there are about 225 campers from Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, New York, Los Angeles and Israel who would benefit from these enhancements.

Moshava has become a generational camp, where the grandchildren of the original campers from 50 years ago are now enjoying the experience, Silver said. "The continuity of the camp, the campers, the staff, the programs, the love of friendship and its connection to being a religious modern Orthodox camp combined with its love for Israel makes it a unique camp experience."

Many campers, including Silver, found their life partners at Moshava, so "there is also a great sense of love and appreciation for the camp and an excitement to send their own children back over and over."

Moshava is the only overnight camp affiliated with Bnei Akiva in Canada with a focus on being modern Orthodox with a love of Torah and Israel. Programming is thematic and based on events in Israel with the aim of advancing Jewish learning.

Camp Moshava campers are ready for Shabbat.

"The addition of small details like milat hayom [the study of a Hebrew word each day] or the use of names from the Israeli army for colour war teams really helps to put Israel as a focal point throughout the summer," Silver said.

The camp hires many staffers from Israel, who teach a love of the country to the campers. In addition to learning and Shabbat programs, Moshava offers waterskiing, a ropes course, drama, swimming, arts and crafts, and hikes.

Silver said the relationships between staff and campers are what make Moshava such a special home away from home. "I think for campers going to a place where their counsellors could be siblings or people they look up to in high school is a very cool thing. The fact that there is comfort in knowing the people you are with and the warmth and spirit you get from the camp is what draws people back each year."

About 75 per cent of the staff members attended Moshava as campers and feel a need to give back to the camp community, he said. Many of the alumni stay connected today through the Moshava website and Facebook.

"For the many who have found their spouses, the camp will always be a place they're connected to. Most stay connected, because they continue to support the camp for their future growth. Many have become members of the Israeli army or made aliyah to live in Israel. There's a feeling of togetherness from the Moshava experience and that is continued in the way the camp's alumni conduct their lives."

Honorees at the Nov. 28 dinner are camp alumni including the Bessin family, Eliezer Yosef Chaim, Harry and Helen Cohen, Ami and Aviva Drazin, Moshe and Faigy Green, Aaron and Miriam Greenberg and Jeffrey and Daniella Silver.

The honorees have all contributed through service, volunteering, as donors or through being role models to campers and staff.

Palestinian issue said key to Israel's survival

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The key to Israel's survival is how it deals with the growing national aspirations of the Palestinians, claims Hirsh Goodman, one of Israel's most prominent journalists and strategic thinkers.

Goodman, the author of a newly published book, The Anatomy of Israel's Survival (McClelland & Stewart), urged Israel to sign a peace agreement with the Palestinian Authority before time runs out.

Speaking at Holy Blossom Temple last week, Goodman, the founder and former editor of the Jerusalem Report, warned that Israel and the Palestinians will pass "the point of no return" within five to seven years.

The Jewish population in the West Bank by then will be so large that the attainment of peace will be out of reach, suggested Goodman, a senior research associate at Tel Aviv University's Jaffe Center for Strategic Studies, where he directs the Bronfman Program on Information Strategy.

"We have to find an [Israeli] leadership that can lead us to peace," he said.

Saying he has no expectation that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu can advance the prospects for peace, Goodman said, "For political reasons, he doesn't want to deal with the West Bank and the settlers."

"Some of Netanyahu's policies are very retrogressive," he added without elaborating.

Outlining his vision of peace, Goodman said it would mean open borders rather than frontiers demarcated by walls and "living together rather than living apart."

Israel should not have to choose whether it will be a "democracy" or an "occupier." In a stark warning, he predicted that Israel will not enjoy the support of the free world if it ceases being a democratic nation.

Goodman, the former defence correspondent of the Jerusalem Post and a contributor to the New Republic, implored Israel to negotiate with the PA, led by President Mahmoud Abbas.

The PA supports a two-state solution, rejects violence as a tactic, has nipped in the bud 95 per cent of security threats against Israel and has brought stability and economic progress to the West Bank, he noted.

Given these facts, it would have made sense for Israel to recognize the PA's current campaign for statehood at the United Nations instead of working against it, Goodman said.

Israel should not allow Hamas – which calls for Israel's destruction – to scuttle negotiations with the PA, he added.

Declaring that the PA's recognition of Israel as a Jewish state is unnecessary, Goodman said that mainstream Palestinian leaders in the PLO recognized Israel's existence as the 1993 Oslo process was launched.

Jewish settlements in the West Bank are the "greatest stumbling block" to peace, he said. The depth of Israel's future borders is no longer a burning issue in the age of advanced rocketry. "The issue is what to do with the settlers."

Goodman acknowledged that the forcible removal of Jewish settlers "will tear Israel to pieces" and spark a civil war.

He contended that all but 20,000 to 30,000 "ideological" settlers would agree to leave their homes in the West Bank if given sufficient compensation.

Hirsh Goodman

Settlers who want to remain in the West Bank under PA authority should be permitted to stay, provided they are law-abiding and pay taxes.

Rejecting media accounts that Israel is internationally isolated, Goodman said that Israel has never been "more secure" or "together with itself." As he put it, "Israel is far from being isolated." Nor is it in jeopardy.

"The question is not whether Israel will survive, but what kind of a country it will be," he said, referring to the size of Israel's Arab minority, which constitutes a fifth of its population, and Israel's growing number of haredi Jews.

Turning to the tense situation between Israel and its former Muslim ally, Turkey, Goodman argued that Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan has realigned Turkey's Mideast policy at Israel's expense, and that even an Israeli apology for the deaths of eight Turkish citizens during the flotilla incident in 2010 would not have satisfied him.

"He's decided that Turkey will go another way," said Goodman, referring to Turkey's decision to build closer relations with the Arab world and Iran.

Goodman said that Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak were prepared to issue some form of an apology, but that Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman vetoed the plan.

"For internal political reasons, Lieberman wants to position himself as 'the tough guy.'"

The recent ouster of Israel's ambassador to Turkey did not set a precedent, he pointed out. "This is the fourth time [since 1949] that Turkey has kicked out our ambassador," said Goodman.

Erdogan should not be so self-righteous, he said. "People in glass houses should not throw stones. Every week, Turkey goes into northern Iraq to slaughter Kurds."

If Turkey makes good on its threat to send warships into the eastern Mediterranean Sea to break Israel's naval blockade of the Gaza Strip, ugly incidents could occur, he said.

Hillel tents aim to promote peace in Mideast

Dustin Pollack
Special to The CJN

In partnership with the Hillel international campaign Talk Israel, Hillel of Greater Toronto launched "The Missing Peace?" campaign at York University, Ryerson University and the University of Toronto last week.

With the expected vote at the United Nations, where the Palestinian leadership was to seek approval for a unilateral declaration of independence, Toronto universities joined about 20 other North American campuses in erecting open-air tents where students were welcome to openly discuss Middle East issues.

"I think all the events we do in this regard are important because universities are spaces where so many conversations are taking place, and the conversation about Israel is definitely an important one," said Beca Bookman, a third-year U of T student and Hillel's Israel affairs chair.

"Students are aware of [the conflict], either from their classes, general knowledge, or however else they come across it, and it's important that students have a place on campus where they can properly have a conversation about it in a welcoming way. A place where we can first learn more about these issues properly," Bookman said.

Students participate in a group discussion during "The Missing Peace?" campaign at York University.

Shirin Ezekiel, Hillel's director of Israel programming, said "The Missing Peace?" campaign implies that the conflict in Israel is a puzzle that has many pieces, the biggest missing piece being peace itself.

And while it's understood that peace isn't going to be achieved through a campaign like this, she hopes that when students come in to learn about and discuss the issue, they will realize "that the end to this conflict must be negotiated by reasonable partners."

India McAlister, a first-year U of T student, attended the event and sat for close to half an hour with a Hillel representative, trying to learn about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"I found out more information from both an Israeli and a Palestinian perspective," she said. "You can learn about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in a book, but these types of events give it a human face."

Curiosity brought other U of T students like Ramin Sadat to the tent.

Sadat admitted he already knew about what was going on in the Middle East, but wanted to become more informed on the history of conflict.

"What happened in Israel in 1967?" Sadat asked during a group discussion with students and Hillel representatives.

Stefanie Sultmanis, a third-year U of T student, believes that events like these are good for the campus climate.

"As long as the event isn't polarizing, trying to favour one side, and it's just a centre to come and talk, I think it's a positive thing."

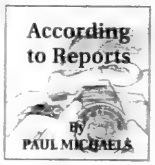
Palestinian rejectionism means statelessness

Last week, this paper's editor drew attention in his column to an important statement made by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in Ramallah on Sept. 16, one week before he was scheduled to address the United Nations in his push for Palestinian statehood recognition.

"What I will take to the UN will be the suffering and concerns of our people that have been taking place over 63 years living under the occupation," Abbas told his people.

In as much as Abbas' statement displayed his deepest hostilities toward Israel, it was also revealing that almost no major media outlet in the West paid attention to it, with the exception of the Wall Street Journal.

Note the timeline of "occupation" stretching back 63 years – that is, since Israel's founding in 1948, 19 years before Israel came into possession of the West Bank and Gaza Strip during the Six Day War. As The CJN's editor noted, Abbas was in effect declaring all of Israel illegitimate and thereby aligning himself with the rejectionists of Hamas, which has always labelled Israel "occupied [Islamic] land."



Abbas also contradicted himself while spreading misinformation. He said that his gambit at the UN was not meant to delegitimize Israel itself, just the "occupation" – implying of the West Bank – and Israel's refusal to accept "internationally recognized borders" for a Palestinian state. But delegitimizing Israel itself was precisely the impact of his reference to 1948.

In addition, Abbas was blatantly wrong about the border issue on at least two fundamental points. First, there are no internationally recognized borders between Israel and the future state of Palestine. Borders cannot be declared unilaterally or imposed through the UN. These need to be determined, and that can only be achieved through Israeli-Palestinian negotiations. The 1967 "borders" that Abbas believes are internationally accepted are in fact only (temporary) armistice lines marking where fighting stopped between Jordan and Israel in 1949.

Second, contrary to the widespread misperception that Abbas and other Palestinian leaders cultivate, it is entirely legitimate for Israel to be in control of territory seized in its war of self-defence in 1967. Indeed, under UN Security Council Resolution 242, passed in the aftermath of that war, Israel is legally entitled to maintain possession of "occupied" territory pending recognition, peace, and security agreements from its Arab neighbours.

Since 1993, when the Olso process began, this includes the Palestinians – and this is the approach the PLO agreed to uphold. Any land that Israel relinquishes (as it did with Egypt, Jordan and even the PLO during Oslo II) is to occur in this peace framework.

The essential point is that it is dangerously false for Abbas to now insist that the remaining part of Israel's "occupation" is illegal and that he needs to prevail upon the UN to provide redress that he cannot achieve through negotiations with Israel.

PA President Mahmoud Abbas

But crucially, the Palestinians can only obtain their state through negotiations with Israel if they're prepared to accept Israel permanently, not as a temporary fact that can be isolated, demonized and eventually done away with.

They must accept Israel as the UN General Assembly itself did in 1947: the state of the Jewish People living side by side with an Arab state – which could now be the future state of the Palestinians. Until that acceptance occurs, Abbas' rejectionism will only bring his people further statelessness.

This column is being filed just before Abbas speaks at the UN and makes his bid for membership at the Security Council. Still, at this time, several media outlets are reporting that senior Palestinian officials have indicated that the Palestinians might accept a Security Council study of their membership bid, which some experts believe could take months if not longer. This way, the United States would not have to exercise its plan to veto the bid if it comes to a vote – a pledge reiterated at the UN on Sept. 21 by President Barack Obama that appears to have vexed some news outlets, including the BBC, to no end.

Associated sets shofar-blowing record

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Associated Hebrew Schools blew into the Guinness World Records book last week with Project Blastoff, the largest-ever shofar ensemble.

Students and staff gathered at Associated's Kamin Education Centre in Thornhill and blew a total 1,406 shofars for five minutes, the required amount of time to set the record. They beat the previous record of 790 shofars.

They were accompanied by the Hallelujah Drummers, music teacher Yehoshua Lavner, and Cantor Eric Moses of Beth Sholom Synagogue.

Eric Golombek, the principal of Associated's Posluns Education Centre on Neptune Drive, who organized the Sept. 23 event, said the school decided to seek the record about five years ago, when a Grade 4 student asked if Associated could be the school that blew the most shofars.

But Rosh Hashanah had never been late enough in the school calendar to have sufficient time to prepare – until this year. "We waited until the time was right, and we set out to do it."

Golombek said that members of Tzivos Hashem, a Chabad children's club, came in and helped every child make a kosher shofar out of ram horns, which Tzivos Hashem supplied.

"The big challenge, though, was learning to blow," he said. "The students worked hard at it."

Mark Smiley, Associated's director of education, said the kids blew the shofars, not only to set the record, but also to "unite, to rise and improve the world. We blow our shofars to wake us up to do good and to be respectful of the gifts that God has bestowed on us."

The witnesses – Guinness requires them for record-setting events – were Vaughan city councillor Alan Shefman and Rabbi Chaim Strauchler of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Emma-Belle Freid, a Grade 2 student at Associated Hebrew Schools' Kamin Education Centre in Thornhill, blows a shofar as part of the school's shofar ensemble that set the Guinness World Record for the most shofars blown at the same time. [Carolyn Blackman photo]

Educator leaves Toronto for California

Veteran educator Gail Freeman – a teacher and social worker by profession – is leaving Toronto after 25 years at Associated Hebrew Schools to become an elementary school principal at a Jewish day school in Irvine, Calif.

She will head up the Lower School division of Tarbut V'Torah Jewish Community Day School as soon as her visa comes through, likely by the time this article is in print.

By Frances Kraft

Just three months ago, Freeman left Associated – where she was vice-principal of the Kamin branch in Thornhill, assuming she'd return in the fall.

At the suggestion of her sister, who lives in Irvine, Freeman sent a resume to the school there, and was offered the job at the end of July.

Surprised and "elated" by what she considered "an incredible, wonderful opportunity," the 58-year-old Johannesburg native accepted the offer after much soul-searching, and consultation with her family: husband Ed, who has his own business and the flexibility to move with her, and their four grown children.

Five years ago, Freeman, who immigrated 25 years ago, moved to Kamin branch from Associated's middle school. Initially she was reluctant to leave the middle school, where she had worked for 20 years, first as head of guidance and later as vice-principal, but the change turned out to be "life-altering" for her.

"Had I not made that change, I would never have been able to go into this [new position]."

Reaction to Freeman's impending move has been mixed, she said. "Some people think I've lost my mind! But other people see it as, 'Wow, that's so amazing.' "

"If this is my mid-life crisis, so be it," she said, her equanimity belied by the enthusiasm in her voice.

Freeman said she's always been excited about her work "Every day was a new day at the school. I would get up with a zest [thinking] 'How can we fill this day in the most meaningful way?' "

At Associated, she also served as head of special education from 1986 to 2000, and introduced numerous initiatives including job shadow days for Grade 8 students, individual education plans and a Holocaust conference. She has also lectured widely on bullying, and started the first association of school counsellors for Jewish day schools in Toronto.

A lesson from the teacher: "Whatever it is you wish to do, it's achievable if you put your heart in it."

Among the changes she's seen in Jewish education in her years here, she noted "great strides" in meeting special education needs, an increase in the use of technology, and a broadening of educational mandate to consider "the whole child."

Despite the warmer weather in California, Freeman said she's not running from Canadian winters. "I love the seasons here. Canada has become home. We have loved the community here, the weather, the culture. The Jewish community is like no other that I have ever experienced. It will always be home."

Students, teacher honour Righteous Gentile

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

While the world applauded Oskar Schindler and other Righteous Gentiles, one heroine, Irena Sendler, lived a largely neglected life in Warsaw, unknown by most of the 2,500 Jews she'd saved.

Then, four girls in Kansas, intrigued by an old magazine clipping that mentioned her – their teacher thought the number might be a typo – ran with it further than anyone in their rural town could have dreamed.

That teacher, Norm Conard, spoke at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham recently, telling Sendler's story and that of the teens who reached out across the world and across generations.

Irena Sendler in 1943 and 2007

In 1999, the students wrote a play based on what they'd learned about Sendler. Life in a Jar tells of her rescue of Jews, mostly children, from the Warsaw Ghetto. As a social worker, she had unique access and the persuasiveness to convince desperate parents and grandparents to relinquish their children.

She wrote each child's name on tissue paper, buried safely in jars beneath an apple tree, before sending them to convents, orphanages and families. Near the end of the war, Sendler was imprisoned and tortured, but never gave up the lists, which were, in most cases, the children's only link to their Jewish past.

Sendler dug up and released the names after the war, but most families were never reunited as adults left behind in the ghetto were ultimately sent to death at Treblinka.

Though the students' play astonished their community, they still hoped to find Sendler's grave. They contacted Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs and Heroes' Remembrance Authority in Jerusalem, which had honoured her in the 1960s. But the students had almost given up, when, in 2000, they discovered that Sendler, then 90 years old, was still living in Warsaw.

They decided to pay her a visit. Backed by a Jewish donor, Conard flew with them to Poland to meet Sendler, where they were dismayed by her cramped living conditions and poor health. She was not expected to live much longer.

They rallied supporters to move her to a seniors facility, where she lived seven years longer, meeting with the teens six times before her death in 2008. Her final message to them: "I love you very, very much."

Elzbieta Ficowska, who remained in Poland after the war, cared for Sendler in her later years. Sendler rescued Ficowska at five months of age, sedated and hurried out in a carpenter's box through one of multiple – and potentially deadly – escape routes from the ghetto. Her parents left a silver spoon in the box, engraved with her first name and birth date, a rare keepsake. Most children had nothing from their families. And like Ficowska, most of the children were too young to remember their rescue.

Nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize in 2007, Sendler spoke modestly of her accomplishments. "I'm no hero; I just did a regular thing... There are so many people you should be writing about."

Yet she had also witnessed the inaction of most Poles during the war years. "I don't think she ever forgave her own country," says Conard. Poland eventually recognized Sendler with numerous awards, including, in 2003, the Order of the White Eagle, its highest civilian decoration.

Sendler may have learned compassion from her father, a doctor who treated Jewish children in a sanatorium. At university, when Jews were forced to sit separately, Sendler sat on the Jews' side. Her professor told her she wasn't Jewish, but she replied, "I am today." She was expelled for one year.

Even today, change is slow coming to Poland, Conard admits. He mourns last year's death of Polish president Lech Kaczynski, calling him a proponent of Holocaust education. Since Sendler's death, her grave has been desecrated three times.

But through donors in the United States, the Life in a Jar Project now offers an annual $10,000 Irena Sendler Award for a Polish teacher who promotes "innovative and inspirational... Holocaust education." There is a parallel award for a U.S. teacher.

The project continues, and Life in a Jar has been performed more than 290 times. In 2009, Hallmark Hall of Fame produced a movie called The Courageous Heart of Irena Sendler. And recently, two books have been released about her life, along with a PBS documentary.

The Toronto event featured a short movie prepared by the students. Attendees included child survivor Mel Goldberg, abandoned as a baby near Warsaw, and Michael Zajdman, son of Renata Zajdman, another child survivor, who has done presentations with the cast of Life in a Jar and recently received a Medal of Merit from the Polish government.

Though not Jewish himself, Conard said he has come to think of Sendler's lifelong mission as tikkun olam. Quoting Sendler, he said, "Compassion for all people is part of repairing the world."

Correction

The article "Developer pledges $1 million to Chabad" (CJN, Sept. 22) contained incorrect information about the area served by Chabad of Mississauga. It serves the Jewish community in Mississauga, Brampton, Milton and Oakville. The CJN regrets the error.

New machzors changing how we pray

David A. M. Wilensky
JTA

SOUTH ORANGE, N.J. — New Jewish prayer books typically come in waves, the rarest of which bring new High Holiday prayer books, or machzors.

The current wave has seen five new machzorim in a one-year span. Following on the heels of last year's release of the official Conservative machzor and a popular chavurah machzor are the first Hebrew-English machzor from the Israeli publisher Koren, a revision to Hillel's On Wings of Awe and pilot tests of services from the forthcoming Reform machzor.

The Conservative movement's Mahzor Lev Shalem was a surprise hit – insofar as a prayer book can be such a thing – selling more than 120,000 copies. More congregations are expected to adopt it for the High Holidays this year.

The chavurah Machzor Eit Ratzon from Joseph Rosenstein, a math professor at Rutgers University and a founding member of the Highland Park Minyan in Highland Park, N.J., is a companion to his Siddur Eit Ratzon. Though Machzor Eit Ratzon is not in use on the same scale as Lev Shalem, it merits inclusion here as a popular, new, independently published machzor.

Both are heavy on commentary. Lev Shalem includes diverse commentaries and readings from sources ranging from chassidic masters to Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel to contemporary poets. Though not entirely transliterated, Lev Shalem includes more transliteration than previous Conservative efforts.

In Machzor Eit Ratzon, each two-page spread is laid out in a strict four-column format, with one column each devoted to the Hebrew, Rosenstein's translation, a robust commentary and a full transliteration.

This year the wave continues with Koren Publishers releasing a Rosh Hashanah-only volume. Its Yom Kippur companion will follow next year.

The venerable Israeli publisher built its reputation on the elegant fonts and layouts of legendary designer Eliyahu Koren. The machzor emphasizes type size and arrangement most strikingly in the machzor with the giant type used at one point for the word "melech" – king – to impart the seasonal liturgy's stress on the theme of God's kingship.

Commentary by British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks is featured, as it was in Koren's first Hebrew-English siddur that propelled the publisher onto the English-language siddur market in 2009.

In co-operation with Hillel, Ktav has published a major revision of the 1985 release On Wings of Awe. The original was released with a number of transliterations, which was rare at the time. The new version includes a complete transliteration in keeping with the trend outside the Orthodox world toward increasingly extensive transliteration.

Perhaps the most anticipated material of the wave, the drafts of new Reform Rosh Hashanah services, will not be a true release at all.

According to Rabbi Hara Person, the publisher and director of CCAR Press – the largest publisher of Reform movement liturgy – some 70 to 100 Reform congregations will test the draft services. It's a considerable sample size, considering the Union for Reform Judaism's membership of 800 congregations.

Person noted that it will be the first new American Reform machzor since the Union Prayer Book II was published in 1925. The Reform movement's current machzor, Gates of Repentance, was adapted from the High Holiday prayer book of its counterparts in Britain's Liberal movement.

Work on the new Reform machzor began in 2008 following the success of the movement's new siddur, Mishkan T'filah, in 2007. Like Mishkan T'filah, the new machzor will feature a layout that includes Hebrew, translation and transliteration on the right side of each spread, while the left side is devoted to commentary and a range of interpretative readings connected with the prayer to the right.

"One of the challenges is how do you do a machzor that's a companion to Mishkan T'filah for people who aren't really familiar with Mishkan T'filah because they only come on High Holidays," Person said.

The Rosh Hashanah morning service was piloted earlier this year in some congregations. Person called the response "very positive."

"People were really excited that we're doing this and that they can be part of the feedback process," she said.

One challenge faced by Reform liturgists is that the most evocative Rosh Hashanah prayers are in Musaf – a section the Reform movement did away with long ago. In the draft, these sections of the Musaf service – Shofarot, Malchuyot and Zichronot – have been distributed throughout the service.

"When people heard about that, a lot of them were aghast at it," Person said, adding however that the approach proved popular among the groups that tested the service.

"By breaking it up, there's this sort of ongoing crescendo, different peaks throughout the service, and that makes it more meaningful," she said.

Person emphasized that the project is still in an early stage.

"The Torah service isn't even in the morning service yet, because we haven't really touched it at all," she said.

Ethics are key to Judaism, rabbi says

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Joseph Telushkin often says he finds it sad that, in modern-day Judaism, the word "religious" has come to be associated exclusively with ritual observance such as kashrut and keeping Shabbat.

The rabbi, who was ordained by Yeshiva University in 1973, was in Toronto on Sept. 15 to speak at Kehillat Shaarei Torah, where he discussed "Being Good: Jewish Ethics for Daily Life" with Elliott Malamet, co-founder of Torah in Motion, at a Torah in Motion program.

Rabbi Joseph Telushkin

Among Rabbi Telushkin's published works is the two-volume A Code of Jewish Ethics: You Shall Be Holy and A Code of Jewish Ethics: Love Your Neighbor As Yourself. He serves as spiritual leader of Los Angeles's Synagogue of the Performing Arts and, in 1999, was named one of the 50 best speakers in the United States by Talk magazine.

In a phone interview shortly before he left Toronto, Rabbi Telushkin said that defining religiosity by ritual observance can leave "a peculiar impression that in Judaism, ethics are an extra-curricular activity."

He would suggest as a message for the coming year that parents reserve their highest praise for their children for their acts of kindness instead of their academic, athletic or cultural achievements, or their good looks, he said.

He believes such a change would have "a transformative effect" not just on the Jewish community but on the broader community as well.

The problem with talking about ethics, Rabbi Telushkin said, is that "you have to go over things that are obvious, and they tend to sound almost cliché."

He explained that Judaism provides "the notion of 'mitzvah' as 'a commandment,' not 'a good deed.'"

"The idea is that when people do things out of a sense of obligation, they'll do it with greater consistency."

As an example, he said, people may go on a diet to become healthier and more attractive, but "very few people can keep a diet consistently without breaking it."

However, he noted, "kashrut doesn't afford those benefits, and yet, because people feel an obligation to do it, they can go for years, a lifetime, without eating foods they're forbidden... That's part of the power of mitzvah."

Rabbi Telushkin said that, although there are many commandments concerning ethical behaviour, "we assume that the language of ethics is more a universal language, and it seems somehow less distinctively Jewish... and [those commandments] are not viewed as the defining characteristics of religiosity."

SEASON KICK-OFF: Chabad Markham youth recently kicked off their new season with a BBQ.

Nothing beats saving lives

Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka

As we head into 5772, we are, as always, searching for the magic formula that will ensure we will have a good year.

In truth, there is no such magic formula. But as much as there is no magic formula for a good year, there is a magic formula for good. The formula is simple –think good, do good, and chances are things will be good. There are many ways in which we can do good – charity, kindness, gentleness, etc.

Guest Voice

For this year, and future years, there is a most welcome way to think good and do good. It is organ donation for after we have lived our life to the full. Organ donation, you say! Is that allowed? And you thought Judaism turns thumbs down on this.

Absolutely wrong. In fact, the opposite is true – that Judaism encourages organ donation as a lifesaving mitzvah. We need to rephrase the question. The right question is not, "Does Judaism allow organ donation?" The right question is, "Does Judaism justify not being an organ donor?"

What possible justification could there be for people who have the capacity to save lives to refuse to do so? There is no justification. And if we are searching to put great achievements on our resumés, nothing beats saving lives. The beauty of it is that thanks to modern advances in medicine, we can save lives even after we die. How is that for being eternal!

But it can only happen if we make our lifesaving wishes known. In Ontario, it is relatively easy. All you need to do is go online to beadonor.ca, and in less than a minute, you are registered. Then, let your family know that you have taken this step, and that you expect your lifesaving wishes to honoured.

Back to asking the right question. What about the mitzvah of complete burial? That is an important concept. But in Judaism we have another, more compelling concept, the concept of "lifesaving override." This means that the saving of life, with rare and limited exception, overrides everything, including Shabbat, Yom Kippur, kashrut, and yes, the mitzvah to be completely buried.

The concept is clear. A greater, more massive, transcending mitzvah takes precedence, and neutralizes other important mitzvah obligations.

The only concern that could possibly stand in the way of posthumous organ donation is whether it is actually posthumous. Some are concerned that they will not be cared for because their organs are needed. Not true. There are painstaking controls to assure this does not happen.

Then, there is the concern about what, and who, defines death. Last May, the Trillium Gift of Life Network (TGLN), which I am privileged to chair, had the pleasure of hosting Rabbi Moshe David Tendler, son-in-law of the greatest Halachist of our time, Rabbi Moshe Feinstein. Rabbi Tendler is arguably the foremost expert in the area of the Halachah on organ donation, as he uniquely combines mastery of halachic and biological issues. The good rabbi was clear, putting to rest any doubts about the legitimacy of brain-stem death as a halachically valid definition of death. A free DVD of this conversation between us is available by calling TGLN at 416-363-4001 or toll free at 1-800-263-2833.

We are thus left with just one final pre-Rosh Hashanah question: "Is there is a better way to enter into the new year than by affirming life, by affirming our readiness, when the time comes, to save the lives of others?"

Rabbi Bulka is the spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa.

Nothing beats saving lives

Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka

As we head into 5772, we are, as always, searching for the magic formula that will ensure we will have a good year.

In truth, there is no such magic formula. But as much as there is no magic formula for a good year, there is a magic formula for good. The formula is simple –think good, do good, and chances are things will be good. There are many ways in which we can do good – charity, kindness, gentleness, etc.

For this year, and future years, there is a most welcome way to think good and do good. It is organ donation for after we have lived our life to the full. Organ donation, you say! Is that allowed? And you thought Judaism turns thumbs down on this.

Absolutely wrong. In fact, the opposite is true – that Judaism encourages organ donation as a lifesaving mitzvah. We need to rephrase the question. The right question is not, "Does Judaism allow organ donation?" The right question is, "Does Judaism justify not being an organ donor?"

Guest Voice

What possible justification could there be for people who have the capacity to save lives to refuse to do so? There is no justification. And if we are searching to put great achievements on our resumés, nothing beats saving lives. The beauty of it is that thanks to modern advances in medicine, we can save lives even after we die. How is that for being eternal!

But it can only happen if we make our lifesaving wishes known. In Ontario, it is relatively easy. All you need to do is go online to beadonor.ca, and in less than a minute, you are registered. Then, let your family know that you have taken this step, and that you expect your lifesaving wishes to honoured.

Back to asking the right question. What about the mitzvah of complete burial? That is an important concept. But in Judaism we have another, more compelling concept, the concept of "lifesaving override." This means that the saving of life, with rare and limited exception, overrides everything, including Shabbat, Yom Kippur, kashrut, and yes, the mitzvah to be completely buried.

The concept is clear. A greater, more massive, transcending mitzvah takes precedence, and neutralizes other important mitzvah obligations.

The only concern that could possibly stand in the way of posthumous organ donation is whether it is actually posthumous. Some are concerned that they will not be cared for because their organs are needed. Not true. There are painstaking controls to assure this does not happen.

Then, there is the concern about what, and who, defines death. Last May, the Trillium Gift of Life Network (TGLN), which I am privileged to chair, had the pleasure of hosting Rabbi Moshe David Tendler, son-in-law of the greatest Halachist of our time, Rabbi Moshe Feinstein. Rabbi Tendler is arguably the foremost expert in the area of the Halachah on organ donation, as he uniquely combines mastery of halachic and biological issues. The good rabbi was clear, putting to rest any doubts about the legitimacy of brain-stem death as a halachically valid definition of death. A free DVD of this conversation between us is available by calling TGLN at 416-363-4001 or toll free at 1-800-263-2833.

We are thus left with just one final pre-Rosh Hashanah question: "Is there is a better way to enter into the new year than by affirming life, by affirming our readiness, when the time comes, to save the lives of others?"

Rabbi Bulka is the spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa.

Jaslo, Poland boasted a Jewish population of 3,000 leading up to the Second World War. In 1905 the Great Synagogue of Jaslo was the heart and soul of Jewish life in the community. Tragically the building and its community were destroyed in 1939.

For more than ten years the Temmy Latner Forest Hill Jewish Centre has served the Jewish community of the neighbourhood. The Centre has become an anchor for Jewish life in the area. Jaslo like hundreds of "Forgotten communities" will be celebrated in this unique facility offering a wide range of educational programs and services that answer the many needs of Jewish Life today.

A Rosh Hashanah greeting

Rabbi Moshe Stern

I write this to our fellow Jews who, though not as observant as some, belong to and attend Orthodox synagogues – or any synagogue.

Many of us are distressed by the gap between the ideals of Torah Judaism and the personal religious practices of these less observant members. They are taunted as "hypocrites" by their so-called friends and they cannot honestly reconcile Torah teachings and their own practices.

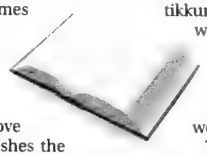
What justification is there for Jews who do not keep Shabbat properly, or have a kosher kitchen, or pray daily, to be part of an Orthodox congregation? Are such people honest with themselves?

I would like to share with you three points to keep in mind.

• Hypocrites, I believe, are happily rare. A hypocrite is one who intends to deceive, one who deliberately presents a false front. Intent is critically important here. I have seldom found a non-observant person who pretends to be observant. Some people attempt to keep part of Shabbat, for example, but do not keep Shabbat completely. Admittedly they are imperfect Shabbat-observers, but hypocrites? No. They may have faults, but dishonesty is not one of them.

• The alternative offered the non-observant to achieve "honesty" is to sever affiliation with the Orthodox shul, to attach an adjective to his Jewishness, to become a "Conservative" or "Reform" Jew. Thus he would remove all obligations to keep mitzvot. My answer is simple: One God gave one Torah to one people. Israel is indivisible. There are no differences among Jews – all groupings, parties, "branches" and modifications are external, superficial and artificial. Jews are Jews, no matter what they call themselves. Names neither impose nor remove obligations. Torah establishes the absolute equality of Jews. Qualms of conscience cannot be stilled by a letter of resignation. Right and wrong for a Jew don't depend on the congregation he belongs to.

Rabbinic Reflections



• Torah is an ideal, and ideals are seldom fulfilled. But if an ideal is unfulfilled should it be rejected? Democracy is Canada's ideal. Is Canada a perfect democracy? Only a fool would say it is. What's the alternative? Fascism? Communism? Or efforts to improve democracy? If we do not fulfil Torah perfectly, does that mean we should reject it completely? The earnest Jew will keep as much Torah as he can, regardless of his religious shortcomings. If he has violated 23 hours of Shabbat, that's no reason for violating the 24th.

As we approach this New Year, let's be honest with ourselves. The lack of meaningful Torah observance in our lives has created a generation in which assimilation and intermarriage are the new normal.

It's ironic that those who preach tikkun olam (repairing the world), encourage by their denigration of Torah laws and values the very opposite in terms of the Jewish world.

There is only one cure I know for non-observance, and that is more observance. If we have too few mitzvot, the solution is to keep more mitzvot.

If all the Jews reading this committed themselves to enhancing their life by additional observances of mitzvot – Shabbat, kashrut and more acts of chesed, then the blessings we all seek in the New Year will surely be fulfilled.

Rabbi Moshe Stern is the spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation in Toronto.

Job Opportunities in the Community

Reena proudly announces the newly created Reena In The Community – Job Placement commitee, chaired by Joan Glick Gold, to open doors in the business community. Employment is a Jewish community need, but persons with developmental disabilities and other challenges have difficulties accessing competitive employment. We promote our clients as loyal workers invested in their work product and have been approached by employers looking to engage people with disabilities in their businesses. Currently, we have placed 16 individuals in businesses that serve large Jewish neighbourhoods (such as Longo's, the Vaughan Liberal, Winners, Toronto Kosher and Cineplex Odeon).

We are formalizing these efforts by developing an employment initiative to provide job searching, training, placement and ongoing support in the workplace. Within a business model, we will demonstrate that employees with developmental disabilities bring benefit to their workplace, and that a disability-inclusive environment creates a better culture for employers and improves overall employee satisfaction and productivity.

Employment Opportunities

We will recruit employment opportunities through one-on-one contacts and presentations to groups and associations. Individual job placements will be negotiated with each company and jobs will be analyzed for matching with potential employees. Individuals will be assessed as to their suitability for each position and matches made. A job coach will assist the employee to integrate into the work place, learn the necessary skills, and deal with potential issues. Through this initiative we will also be creating jobs for young people looking for meaningful careers as job shadows adding to their skill sets and marketability. The job coach will transfer this support function to the employer as appropriate.

Provincial government legislation will shortly make it mandatory to include people with disabilities in the workplace. Consumers feel more favourable toward companies that hire individuals with disabilities, with many preferring to deal with those companies. Economic realities and public perceptions, as well as family expectations, are driving this change to create more opportunities for people with disabilities.

Economic Realities and Benefits

The benefits to the individual and their family are many and varied, including increased social and financial independence and greater self-esteem. The benefits to the business community can be measured both qualitatively (morale, community perception) and quantitatively (value for the salary spent, reduced recruitment/turnover costs). This will have an enormous and positive impact on our community. We look forward to a new era of inclusion in the business world.

The uncertainty of life

The stock market hates uncertainty. This helps explain the wild gyrations of the markets, unable to "decide" whether we are headed for a double-dip recession or whether the trillions in corporate profits are a reflection of the good times ahead.

Is it the millions of North Americans looking for work or the lineups to buy the latest iPhone that are the true indicator of our collective economic shape? The fact that both are true just adds to the confusion.

Spending decisions, business investment and hiring are to a large extent dependent on confidence in the future. Fears about the future, even if unwarranted, can easily become a self-fulfilling prophecy. This is why consumer confidence is so important, strangely, perhaps even more so than actual economic data. As in politics, marketing and so much else, perception is reality and the future will be greatly influenced by our perception of today even if it be somewhat divorced from reality.

While economic uncertainty may be unnerving, even scarier is the uncertainty of life in general. "On Rosh Hashanah, it is written and on Yom Kippur it is sealed... who shall live and who shall die". As much as we may not like it, in life there are no guarantees. While markets may not like uncertainty, from a moral point of view there is much value in such uncertainty. It is not by chance that the Land of Israel has few natural resources. It is much more dependent on rain than say, Canada for its sustenance. This is no unfortunate geographical coincidence; rather it was a way to strengthen the link between the Jewish people and God.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The Jewish People could rely on their geographical fortune if they were to be materially successful. They would have to use their ingenuity, creativity and resourcefulness to create a flourishing society fulfilling the biblical mandate to be a "wise and understanding nation" and a "light unto the nations." The lack of resources is meant to foster our recognition that it is God who controls nature and is our greatest "resource." Being dependent on God for our sustenance should instil within us the need to follow His will. While it cannot be scientifically proven, a person of faith understands the crucial link between our actions and the course of events. The uncertainty over our future success is thus meant to foster our moral growth.

Paradoxically, both the greatest certainty and the greatest uncertainty is that of death. While we all know we are going to die, we are uncertain as to when; and that combination should be a great motivator. Those who, God forbid, receive a "medical" death sentence live much differently; generally focusing on the "important" things in life. It is this idea that is behind the astounding rabbinic comment, that interprets the verse "and God saw all that He created and it was very good" as referring to death. Death may mark the end of our physical existence, but that realization is morally necessary, and can lead to "very good." Our tradition teaches that tzedakah annuls the evil decree. There is no greater way to prepare for the new year than by using our blessings to help others.

Jewish life in Toronto, 1933-1948

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

The 1930s were difficult and cataclysmic for Jews around the world.

At the start of this period, Hitler attained power in Germany and began to implement odious anti-Jewish measures. In eastern Europe, the situation was only slightly better, and many Jews tried to escape from rampant discrimination there. Sadly, there were few countries that would accept them. Immigration to the Land of Israel was severely restricted, and the Jews there led a precarious existence.

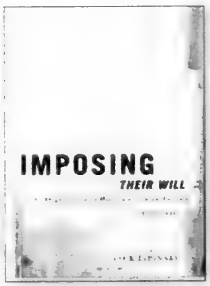
Canadian Jews were much better off, yet they experienced discrimination (often open) in employment, housing and education. Although Jewish lives were not in danger, the day-to-day discrimination that they faced then make the concerns heard today about current antisemitism look like childish bellyaching.

Jack Lipinsky's engaging new book paints a vivid picture of Jewish life in Toronto in this period. In Imposing Their Will: An Organizational History of Jewish Toronto 1933-1948 (McGill-Queens University Press), Lipinsky shows how Jewish organizations, large and small, tried to deal with all of the problems mentioned above.

The problems were real and the community, as we learn from Lipinsky, was fractious and disorganized. Toronto in the 1930s and '40s was decidedly not Canada's leading Jewish community. On many issues, Toronto's community organizations received counsel, occasionally paternalistic, from the stronger and more established Jewish community of Montreal. They often turned to New York and other U.S. cities for advice as well.

Lipinksy earned his PhD at the University of Toronto and then turned his dissertation into this book. Like a good academic, he tries to organize the stories that he tells about community in-fighting around a central theme: the tensions between "uptown" Jews (who were generally more acculturated and more affluent) and the amcha (the generally poorer Jews who lived in the downtown core and often reflected a more "Old World" attitude to questions of governance, of charitable giving and of confronting the dangers that beset Jews). The title of the book, "Imposing Their Will," refers to the success of the uptown Jews who, after many years of struggle, wrested control of charity and Jewish advocacy functions from more grassroots organizations such as the Jewish trade unions, the Yiddishists, the Jewish Communists and the landsmannschaften. A landsmannschaft (the singular of lansdsmannschaften), is an organization of Jews who emigrated from the same town in Europe. In the first half of the 20th century some of these groups were powerful. (A few of them still exist today, and in fact Lipinsky serves as spiritual leader at the synagogue that was founded by the Stashiver Society, Anshei Staszow-Slipi Congregations in Toronto, a group of Jews who emigrated from Stashiv, Poland, where my grandparents came from.)

These uptown Jews promoted the professionalization of Jewish community leadership and of fundraising operations. The profession of social work had just recently been created at this time, and the uptowners pushed hard for the new and unprecedented idea that the community would be better off if it were led by trained social workers. They advocated "scientific philanthropy" and "rational community planning." On the other hand, as Lipinsky writes, "Downtown organizations rooted in traditional tzedakah practices preferred independent fundraising campaigns."



At this time, the organized community began to exercise more control over educational institutions via the centralization of community powers. (Lipinsky, a gifted day-school educator who has pulled off the difficult feat of writing a solid academic book while working full time in a middle school, is particularly interested in this topic.) He argues that, at least on the financial level, the centralized community structure saved some Jewish schools, by forcing them not to go into spiralling debt through the temptation of mortgaging their properties in order to pay teachers.

A Canadian Jew reading this book in 2011 can't help wondering whether this centralization and professionalization was, in the long run, a positive development. Lipinsky resists the temptation of constantly comparing the 1930s and '40s to our decade (although such comparisons often do come to the reader's mind). In the last pages of the book, though, he takes a stand. He notes that Prof. Hasia Dinur was probably correct when she wrote (about the United States, but he feels it applies to Canada): "In their attempt to manage the organizational chaos, the federations compromised the essential democracy of American Jewish life. They centralized authority in the hands of professional staff and big donors." Lipinsky concludes that while Dinur is right, on balance we have gained from that centralization.

Lipinsky's case is convincing. Yet his book does make me wonder. I was particularly shocked by the story of the Jewish orphans whom the Canadian Jewish community wished to bring here after World War II. After much communal lobbying, the Canadian government agreed to allow a mere 1,000 to resettle in Canada. Despite years of consolidation and organization of centralized community institutions in Toronto, the organized community felt it was simply unable to deal with their share of these orphans and requested that they be sent to other Canadian cities while Toronto figured out how to manage this task. Of course, it's hard to say whether the temporary inability of the organized Toronto community to perform the mitzvah of resettling these needy orphans was because the task was given to professionalized "organized" uptowners and not to amcha, or because the uptowners hadn't yet organized and centralized the community sufficiently.

People in the know about current issues will be interested in some of the old communal disagreements described in this book, sometimes in very great detail. We are blessed to have a professionalized, organized and capable centralized leadership. But sometimes their decisions to "rationalize" community services leave many of us scratching our heads (for example, the recent decision to transfer control of the central Jewish educational leadership in Toronto from educators to MSWs and MBAs). Readers who care about such issues, or who just like reading Canadian Jewish history, will enjoy this book.

Tories hope for inroads in Liberal bastion

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

St. Paul's

It's the kind of statement you'd expect candidates in the midst of an election campaign to make.

They've been knocking on doors, shaking hands, greeting voters and, yes, people are telling them they are in the mood for a change – if they're the challenger.

Or, they realize what a good job the government is doing, and it's time to stay the course – if they're the incumbent.

Provincial polls have shown the governing Liberals and the Progressive Conservatives in a close race throughout the province, but it appears it'll take some campaigning magic for the Tories to make inroads in St. Paul's.

The Liberals have held the midtown Toronto riding since it was created in 1999. The current MPP, Eric Hoskins, the minister of citizenship and immigration, took it in a byelection two years ago over Tory candidate and Toronto Sun columnist Sue-Ann Levy. Hoskins won 47.6 per cent of the vote to Levy's 28.3 per cent, with the New Democratic candidate, Julian Heller, back at 16.9 per cent.

Hoskins replaced Liberal Michael Bryant, who had captured the riding in 2007 with 47.43 per cent of the vote. That margin was down from earlier wins, when Bryant garnered more than 50 per cent of the vote. The Tories' best showing was in 1999, when cabinet minister Isabel Bassett received more than 40 per cent of the vote.

This year, Progressive Conservative Christine McGirr and New Democrat David Hynes are challenging Hoskins, along with candidates from the Green, Freedom, Libertarian, Socialist and Northern Ontario Heritage parties.

Hynes did not response to requests for an interview.

McGirr said she's confident she can make inroads into the Liberal bastion. People are engaged on the Tories' issues, in particular health care, education and taxes. "We've identified that in the families" we've met, she said.

"I think the key to health care is to recognize that it is not [currently] focused on the most important person – the patient. It's focused on… bureaucracy."

Little is being done to address long term patient care, she continued. Thirty-five thousand beds "need to be renovated over 10 years" and 5,000 new beds must be added to address the needs of seniors, she said.

She noted the Liberal's $1-billion eHealth boondoggle, saying that was "money that could have been sent to front-line patient care."

The Liberals, she contended, have diverted funds from front-line patient care "to pay bureaucrats' salaries." The Tories have pledged to increase allocations to health by $6 billion a year by the end of their first mandate.

Likewise, in the education system, she continued, trustees' expenses eat up vast sums that could go to education. Under the McGuinty administration, the number of administrators earning more than $100,000 has grown by 150 per cent, she said.

Eric Hoskins

"That's a lot of money that could be directed to students."

Tory campaign literature has contrasted the province's private sector growth of 10 per cent since 2003, while the government has grown by almost 80 per cent.

For his part, Hoskins refers to the same issues cited by McGirr as Liberal strong suits – health care, education, jobs, the economy, plus transit.

Christine McGirr

The Liberals, he said, have built 18 hospitals in the province after the Tories, under Mike Harris, closed 28. They've hired 11,000 nurses, while the Tories let go 9,000. Surgical wait times are down.

"When you compare and contrast, you see fundamental differences," he said.

As for education, the Grits have rolled out full-day kindergarten. High school graduation rates are up since the Liberals succeeded the Conservatives and 200,000 new places in colleges and universities have been added.

Asked about the Tory critique of government waste, Hoskins said, "We're always looking for efficiencies. I ran in the byelection on accountability."

Under the Harris government, 26 million schools days were lost due to teacher walkouts. None have been lost under the Liberals, he said.

McGirr countered by saying much of the government spending is wasteful. "We want to run the system better. There is so much waste. We want to ensure that we focus on the end users."

She attacked Premier Dalton McGuinty for pledging $30 million for foreign student scholarships, saying "we'd direct that to Ontario students."

The Tories would reduce the HST on heating and hydro bills and remove the eco tax on batteries and light bulbs. She blasted the Liberals for "waste, secret deals and tax increases."

McGuinty pledges cash for Mount Sinai

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

On the hustings last Thursday, Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty announced that his government will give Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital funding for a planned massive upgrade to its facilities.

Dalton McGuinty

He said the province would fund an expansion of the hospital's surgery, critical care and emergency rooms.

While it sounded like a campaign pledge, the government had in fact promised the money to Mount Sinai prior to the election campaign, according to a hospital spokesperson.

"This new expansion will mean faster and easier access to high-quality health care for families when they need it most," McGuinty said during a tour of the hospital last week.

The premier did not disclose exactly how much money the province would give Mount Sinai for the expansion.

A Sept. 22 report in The Toronto Star said the premier indicated the funding would be in the "hundreds of millions" range.

According to the province, the money is earmarked for renovation and expansion of the emergency department, including dedicated space for mental health services; a new surgical suite with 19 operating rooms; redevelopment of ambulatory care, and the relocation of the adult critical care unit to allow better patient flow.

The province would tap the provincial infrastructure fund for the project, and McGuinty said it will pay 90 cents on every dollar invested for the expansion.

As of The CJN's deadline, there was no word from the province on how much of the project had been put out for bidding.

In a speech last week, Lawrence Bloomberg, chair of Mount Sinai Hospital's board, said he was proud of all the hospital had achieved.

"From its founding, Mount Sinai has been anchored in core Jewish values centered around making the world a better place," he said. "Our founders raised funds to build a hospital based on compassion and excellence. Those values remain central to the important work we do and will sustain us far into our future."

Trade mission to Israel high on Liberal agenda

In related news, McGuinty also announced last Thursday that if his government is re-elected on Oct. 6, he promises to make a return trip to Israel some time during his next term.

The premier first visited Israel in May 2010, when he led an economic and cultural mission to the country.

"Developing stronger trade ties with Israel and the West Bank is helping to grow and build a stronger, more competitive economy here at home," McGuinty said. "We'll continue to improve the partnerships we've made so far and reach out to new markets that are growing."

His 2010 visit resulted in numerous memorandum of understanding between the province and Israeli venture capitalists and life-science sector incubators, resulting in "millions of dollars" of investment in the province, according to the government.

In an interview with The CJN prior to the 2010 trip, McGuinty said he viewed Israel as a great learning opportunity for the province.

"Israel is punching far above its weight. There's something next to miraculous in terms of the dynamism and strength of its economy. It continued to grow during this recession," he said.

According to the province's most recent statistics, in 2008 "two-way goods" trade between Ontario and Israel totaled almost $1.1 billion, up 86 per cent from 2004.

"I'm looking to accelerate" those numbers, McGuinty said at the time.

Last week, he criticized Conservative and NDP leaders Tim Hudak and Andrea Horwath for opposing the Israeli trade mission and said they both display a "shocking lack of understanding of our economy through their attacks on foreign investment and trade."

Since the start of the electoral campaign, The CJN has repeatedly called on both Hudak and Horwath to tell readers where they stand on continued provincial trade with Israel, among other topics of interest to the community.

As of the paper's deadline, neither had returned calls or e-mails requesting comment.

Tough battle looms in Toronto riding

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Eglinton-Lawrence

The Liberal incumbent for Eglinton-Lawrence, Mike Colle, faces a tough battle against high-profile Conservative candidate Rocco Rossi.

Ironically, Rossi was the national director of the Liberal Party of Canada in 2009. He also ran unsuccessfully for mayor of Toronto last year before setting his sights on becoming an MPP.

Running for the NDP in the riding is Gerti Dervishi, a former project manager at the Ministry of Health and Long Term Care. The Green Party is fielding Josh Rachlis, an advertising copywriter and eco-comedian.

Speaking to The CJN last week, Colle, Rossi and Dervishi said they understood the priorities of constituents in the riding.

Rachlis was unavailable to be interviewed by The CJN's deadline.

Colle said his constituents are saying they're afraid of potential cuts to services by the City of Toronto, whether it's TTC service, snowplowing or library closures.

"They're saying 'We can't have a government in Queen's Park that's also into cutting,'" Colle said, alluding to the Conservative party.

He also noted that residents are calling for the "crosstown Eglinton LRT and subway" to finally be built to improve traffic and business and revitalize the riding.

Rossi said the Conservatives have set aside $35 billion for infrastructure renewal in the province and that he would "champion" the Eglinton LRT-subway if elected.

Constituents are mostly looking for economic relief and are sick of excess taxation, Rossi said. As such, he noted that the Conservatives plan to "offer relief" to families by eliminating the HST on home heating and electricity, as one example.

Rossi also said constituents are wary of the proposed redevelopment of Lawrence Heights by the city, which he said would "increase population density by 6-1/2 times" in the area.

"It would overwhelm traffic and water infrastructure," he said. Rossi said he would ensure the proposal was "rethought on a more human scale."

Dervishi said people told him they're looking for job creation, and "affordability" of services in the city.

He added that constituents he spoke to are also worried about traffic congestion in the riding.

Asked about continued provincial economic trade with Israel – Colle participated in a 2010 Liberal economic mission to the country, while Rossi has visited twice on trips sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – Colle said it was the "number 1 economic item on Ontario's agenda."

Candidates discuss trade with Israel

"There's no better [economic] fit in the whole world right now than Ontario and Israel. We've got doctors, researchers and entrepreneurs who work both here and in Israel," he said.

Colle added: "Whatever we can do to foster more economic ties with Israel... it's really a golden opportunity for Ontario. We should get more aggressive with it. We should have a trade mission to Israel every year. It would be a huge benefit to Ontario. This relationship is tailor-made for Ontario."

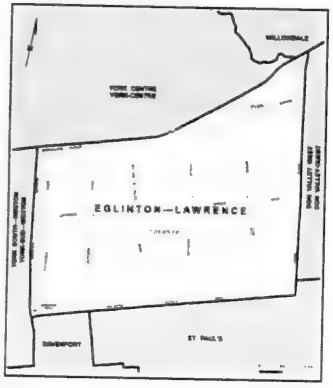
Rossi said the Conservative party would be a "very strong partner" for Israel if elected, one that shares the same "principled stance" on the Jewish state as its federal cousins.

Personally, Rossi said he is an outspoken critic of the so-called "Israeli apartheid week" on university campuses and the group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid, and would be a strong advocate for the Jewish community.

Dervishi said his party "strongly believes" in Israel as an ally for Ontario both politically and economically as the only democracy in the Middle East.

"We are committed to developing a stronger partnership" with Israel, he said.

He added he was excited to communicate this to Jewish constituents personally, as someone of Albanian descent.



"Growing up as a child in Albania, we had history lessons on Israel and learned about how not one Jew was killed in Albania during World War II. We had more Jewish people [in Albania] after the war than in the beginning," Dervishi said.

With regard to communities at risk of hate crime, Colle said that hatemongers, antisemitic or otherwise, should be "hit with the full force of the law."

He said he would continue to promote public education about the seriousness of hate crimes.

Rossi said he's concerned about university campuses continuing to be used as places where antisemitism is promoted.

"It's a real clear and present danger that we have to stay vigilant on, starting with a zero-tolerance [policy] on university campuses," he said.

Related to this, Rossi said the Conservative platform also promises to prevent unions from taking "unilateral actions" with members' dues to promote political agendas.

"We find it heinous that the Liberals are now using Sid Ryan quotes on their healthcare pieces in some ridings," he said. The labour leader was quoted on Liberal campaign pamphlets earlier this month, lauding the province for taking on drug companies and "big pharmacies."

"This is the same union leader that tried to lead a boycott of Israeli academics to Canada. There are lots of union members, Jewish or otherwise, who don't want their dues used for these purposes. We will have pay-cheque protection for union members," Rossi said, referring to Ryan's boycott call in 2009 while president of the Ontario wing of the Canadian Union of Public Employees.

Dervishi said an NDP government would help educate students about hate crimes and provide sensitivity training to workers on this issue.

On the question of funding for faith-based schools, the issue that dominated the 2007 provincial election, Colle said he has an open mind.

"I never shut the door to creative, innovative approaches [to faith-based funding]. I represent the people of my riding, including my faith-based constituents. It's my job to bring their concerns to my premier," he said.

Colle said he would bring the concern back to Premier Dalton McGuinty, as he has in the past.

Rossi said it was unfortunate that this issue was made "radioactive" by the current Liberal government.

"Sadly, this is not on the agenda now, because of how much anger was generated in the province. But we understand the financial pressures this places on many families. While we can't do it through [school funding], we are committed to reducing the provincial income tax on the first $75,000 and allow income splitting," he said. "This will save the average family of four in Toronto between $1,400 and $2,000. It's not the same level [of help], but it's immediate assistance that helps give families some more breathing room who are meeting these large fiscal commitments on the schooling side."

Note to readers: this week's Eglinton-Lawrence riding election profile does not include comments from Green Party Candidate Josh Rachlis, who was unable to conduct an interview prior to our print deadline.

Rachlis' comments can be read in the online version of The CJN this week at www.cjnews.com .

"We would reduce income tax by five per cent on the first $75,000 of taxable income and introduce income sharing" for couples, a move "that recognizes a family budget," she said.

Hoskins said the Liberals are on the right track in guiding Ontario through the recession. "We've regained all the lost jobs" and unemployment is lower than in December 2008, he said.

As for tax relief, Hoskins said the Liberals introduced the biggest tax cuts in a couple of generations, 17 per cent on the first $37,000, affecting 73 per cent of taxpayers.

Asked about criticism that McGuinty has a record of saying one thing and doing another. Hoskins said he's hearing a lot of support for the premier. People understand "when we explain some of the difficult choices Ontario has had to make over the years."

Unlike Tory Leader Tim Hudak, McGuinty brings people together, he said.

Chinese, Iranian activists speak at Durban III

'The Human Rights Council at the UN is composed of some of the worst human rights abusers in the world'

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

In response to the United Nations-sponsored "Durban III" anti-racism conference – which many have criticized for its tolerance of anti-Israel and anti-semitic rhetoric – 22 international NGOs organized a counter-conference to explore human rights issues that aren't on the UN agenda.

On Sept. 21 and 22, the We Have A Dream Global Summit Against Discrimination and Persecution was held across the street from UN headquarters in New York, where the 10th anniversary of the Durban Declaration and Programme of Action – or Durban III – was taking place.

"The Human Rights Council at the UN is composed of some of the worst human rights abusers in the world. Saudi Arabia is on there. China is on there. Until recently, Libya was on there until things got completely egregious," said Emile Scheffel, the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students' (CFJS) vice-president of external relations, who was one of the Canadian representatives on the American Jewish Committee's delegation.

"You've got this Durban III conference which is touted as an anti-racism conference, but a lot of people would say that an anti-racism conference is meaningless when you have keynote speakers such as [Iranian president] Mahmoud Ahmadinejad who is fresh off a new round of persecution of religious minorities in his country and routinely calls for Israel to be wiped off the map."

Following the first two Durban conferences, in 2001 in South Africa and in 2009 in Geneva, 14 countries – Canada, the United States, Israel, the United Kingdom, Germany, Italy, the Czech Republic, Austria, Australia, Bulgaria, Poland, New Zealand, France and the Netherlands – have boycotted the event to protest Ahmadinejad who used the conference as a platform to demonize Israel and deny the Holocaust.

"The big issue of concern that has come up in the last couple years, especially with the Durban conferences being held, is that human rights in the way it's presented by the United Nations is too often about singling out one country, which happens to be Israel," Scheffel said.

He said that the We Have A Dream conference allowed former political prisoners and human rights activists from China, Iran and the Sudan to share their stories of persecution and perseverance.

"It is a really interesting way of getting these people's concerns onto the global agenda and getting them the attention they deserve," he said.

Among the speakers were Montreal-native Hillel Neuer, the executive director of UN Watch, a human rights NGO based in Geneva; Liberal MP Irwin Cotler and Marina Nemat, a former Iranian political prisoner who immigrated to Canada 20 years ago.

Scheffel said he hopes the conference will succeed in sending the UN a message that it should consider creating a forum that doesn't provide dictators with a platform.

Emile Scheffel

"I think it's going to send a really strong message that while those people can gain a certain amount of influence with the United Nations, they're not going to be able to silence the voices of dissent from within oppressive regimes," he said.

"It's a really inspiring example of people coming together in a free country and talking about freedom."

Food for thought

As we usher in the High Holiday season, with Yom Kippur quickly approaching, there's one common thought on many Jewish minds: the anticipated fast.

From sunset on Friday to sunset on Saturday next week, Jewish people around the world will put their chicken soup and gefilte fish aside to embark on a day-long journey of repentance, soul-searching and utter hunger.

As a child, it was clearly understood that after my bat mitzvah, I would have to take part in this unique ritual. The anxiety built up steadily as that first fast snuck up on me. After all, what growing teenager would willfully go without food for a full day? At the time, I regarded that initial fast as one of the toughest tasks I had endured. Unfortunately, millions of others around the world are put to this test every single day.

While writing this column, I started to consider different strategies that would help teenagers and young adults to experience a truly meaningful fast.

Yes, we know that we go without food while we repent and ask for forgiveness for our sins. However, it's difficult to truly be contrite when most young people are stubborn in their foolhardy belief that they're invincible and unaccountable for any fault.

Campus Life

Jessica Pollock

In addition to prayer and synagogue services, Jewish youth should seek out the following method to show their forgiveness for past wrongdoings. In reference to the popular expression that actions speak louder than words, this Yom Kippur, I suggest that we interpret the traditional fast as an opportunity to take social action.

Fasting for this holiday is often considered a stressful one-day undertaking each year. However, for scores of children and young adults in developing countries and even in first-world nations, hunger is an issue they face every day.

According to Mazon Canada, a non-profit agency that acts as the national Jewish response to hunger, and Food Banks Canada, 35 per cent of food banks ran out of food in 2010, and 38 per cent of individuals that regularly use food banks are under 18 years of age.

Hunger in Canada is for the most part an unspoken issue. Every person should have enough food to sustain themselves, yet, many adults and children still go to sleep hungry and malnourished.

This Yom Kippur, imagine yourself living the life of someone less privileged who goes without food for longer than a single day in a constant struggle for survival.

Tzedakah, a religious obligation in Judaism, is one of the sacred acts that grant forgiveness for misconduct. There's no better time than during this upcoming holiday of atonement to perform a mitzvah by helping the hungry. There are numerous ways to contribute: donate food products to relevant organizations, volunteer at a local food bank or a meals-on-wheels program, or even start a fundraiser at your school or university.

Given the state of our present economy, it appears that the risk for those impoverished and hungry may only increase. Apart from the importance of repenting for our sins of this past year, let's use the upcoming Yom Kippur fast as a reminder to be grateful for what we have and to continue supporting others who are not as fortunate.

Kenney rallies against Durban III

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Somewhat lost in the shuffle of the Palestinian statehood drama at the United Nations was the latest iteration of the controversial series of UN anti-racism conferences being held last week in New York City.

Jason Kenney, Canada's minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, slammed the meeting and its organizers while in New York for a meeting organized by critics of the UN parley.

Canada was the first country to withdraw from the so-called "Durban III" conference – which derives its nickname from the site of the first such meeting in Durban, South Africa, in 2001 – because it said that the events have "been irremediably tainted from the beginning thanks in part to open expressions of antisemitism and the organizing role of countries who are involved in widespread and systematic human rights violations," Kenney said.

The ostensible purpose of the original UN World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance was to talk about racism, but it quickly turned into an Israel-bashing extravaganza.

As an alternative, Jewish groups organized a counter-conference titled "The Perils of Global Intolerance: The United Nations and Durban III" at a hotel near the UN building last week to spotlight the hypocrisy of the Durban process.

Canada, Israel, the United States, Jewish groups and some European countries have denigrated the Durban process, skipping the 2009 Durban Review Conference in Geneva as well as last week's gathering in New York.

In his speech to the anti-Durban conference last week, Kenney said that the Durban conferences have been "blighted by crude antisemitism and bully tactics by some of the most dangerous and lawless nations in the world."

Kenney also took sarcastic aim at the many "extremist" NGOs who attend and promote the Durban conferences.

"If there's one thing the self-appointed defenders of human rights can't get enough of, it's camping out at five-star hotels in New York while slinging abuse at America and her allies," he said.

He added: "Let's not hold our breath for Durban III to denounce the murderous regimes that enslave their own people or the bigoted and violent persecution of gays and lesbians, of religious and ethnic minorities in states too numerous to mention or for any recognition that responsibility for ending the violence in the Middle East falls on Hamas, Hezbollah and the regimes who supply them with the weapons of terror.

"For the Durban enthusiasts, it is always about the faults of the west and of Israel. It's easier to pin the blame for poverty on the historical wrongs of liberal democracies than on the regimes that exploit the wretched of the Earth today. It's easier to scapegoat Israel than to decry leaders who use the Palestinians as political pawns. This is why our government has lost faith in the Durban process."

The anti-Durban event also drew thousands of Iranian-American pro-democracy campaigners. Along with prominent speakers, the Jewish-backed group Iran180 held a mock wedding between effigies of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Syrian President Bashar Assad – they were married under a chupah.

Other speakers at the counter-conference included Ron Lauder, president of the World Jewish Congress; former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton; Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel; former New York City mayor Ed Koch, and the current and former Israeli ambassadors to the United Nations.

Many of the speakers offered an insider's look at what transpired at the original Durban conference. Wiesel recalled his resignation from the Durban committee and described the United Nations as a "great idea that has been perverted."

"It has become a forum far from the aspirations of its founders," he said.

Terror victims bill re-introduced in House

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Conservative government has re-introduced legislation that would help victims of terrorism seek compensation from the perpetrators or those who sponsored them.

The Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act – formerly Bill C-35, and now folded into the government's omnibus Safe Streets and Communities Act, introduced in Parliament on Sept. 20 by Justice Minister Rob Nicholson – would "amend the State Immunity Act to lift immunity [from Canadian prosecution] for states listed by Canada as supporters of terrorism," the government says.

Rob Nicholson

Bill C-35 would also allow victims to claim and recover damages from those who perpetrate or support terror, retroactive to 1985.

"I am proud today to announce that our government has fulfilled its commitment to Canadians to bring forward legislation to make our streets, families and communities safer," Nicholson said.

It's the third time the Victims of Terrorism Act has been brought forward by the Conservatives. The last time was in April 2010, but the bill never made it through the House to become law.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) welcomed the tabling of the new omnibus bill.

In a statement, David Koschitzky, CIJA's chair, said: "The Jewish community is highly supportive of the government's re-introduction of these important measures to support victims of terrorism. As a community at risk, we believe that Canadian victims of terrorism should have the ability to seek direct redress from those who commit and support acts of terrorism, including foreign states."

A similar private members' bill was introduced in Parliament in 2009 by Liberal MPs Irwin Cotler and Bob Rae – Bill C-408 – but it, too, never made it through the House.

The new omnibus bill also comprises eight other pieces of legislation that would, the government said, help protect Canadians.

These include the Protecting Children from Sexual Predators Act (formerly Bill C-54); the Penalties for Organized Drug Crime Act (formerly Bill S-10); Sébastien's Law (Protecting the Public from Violent Young Offenders – formerly Bill C-4); the Ending House Arrest for Property and Other Serious Crimes by Serious and Violent Offenders Act (formerly Bill C-16); the Increasing Offender Accountability Act (formerly Bill C-39); the Eliminating Pardons for Serious Crimes Act (formerly Bill C-23B); the Keeping Canadians Safe (International Transfer of Offenders) Act (formerly Bill C-5); and the Preventing the Trafficking, Abuse and Exploitation of Vulnerable Immigrants Act (formerly Bill C-56).

The speakers seemed divided on the continued significance of the Durban process. Israel's current ambassador to the United Nations, Ron Prosor, described it as a continued danger.

Representatives of Iran, Cuba and Lebanon blasted Israel at last week's Durban review conference.

While some speakers made reference to what Iran's representative called "the stonewalling behaviour" of a few nations – an allusion to the more than a dozen countries that boycotted Durban III out of concern for anti-Israel bias – most speakers used the opportunity to herald the progress of their own countries in combating racism. That included, for example, the representative from Zimbabwe, who called his nation "a tolerant and peace-loving country."

In his own remarks, Amnesty International's representative, Jose Luis Diaz, accused many participating countries of being in a "state of denial" about human rights abuses and racism in their countries, saying nations were using the conference to "score political points."

Canada first to sign antisemitism protocol

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Fittingly, Canada is the first country to sign the Ottawa Protocol on combating antisemitism.

The document was drafted in Ottawa at the November 2010 Conference on Combating Antisemitism and was signed last week by Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney and Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird.

It represents the outgrowth of a series of conferences by the Inter-Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Anti-Semitism (ICCA), which co-hosted the Ottawa conference along with the government of Canada last year.

The ICCA is chaired by Irwin Cotler, Liberal MP for Mount Royal.

The protocol contains a series of measures that seek to end hateful propaganda online and in places such as university campuses and distinguishes valid criticism of Israel from antisemitism.

"Criticism of Israel similar to that levelled against any other country cannot be regarded as antisemitic," the protocol states. "But singling Israel out for selective condemnation and opprobrium – let alone denying its right to exist or seeking its destruction – is discriminatory and hateful, and not saying so is dishonest."

Cotler praised the government on being the document's first signatory and noted that 140 parliamentarians representing 50 countries unanimously adopted it.

"We trust that this Canadian initiative will inspire other governments to act and parliamentarians to speak in common cause. As Nobel peace laureate Prof. Elie Wiesel put it at the opening ceremony of the conference, 'Now is the time to mobilize a constituency of conscience on behalf of all humanity. For as history has taught us only too well, while it may begin with Jews, it doesn't end with Jews,'" Cotler said.

Jewish community leaders and groups also hailed the government's signing of the document last week.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) commended the signing. In a statement, CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel called the document "groundbreaking" in its findings and recommendations.

The Ottawa Protocol "will serve as the basis of the renewed international effort against antisemitism. The fact that this important document was crafted in Ottawa is further testimony to Canada's leadership role in this vital global battle," he said.

John Baird

Jason Kenney

Irwin Cotler

Fogel added: "We are hopeful that the recommendations of the Ottawa Protocol will not only be adopted by other countries, but will serve as a model for countering all forms of hatred and discrimination."

At the signing, Kenney said Canada is fighting antisemitism in a number of ways.

"The Ottawa Protocol complements what Canada is already doing to combat hatred and discrimination, including antisemitism," he said. "We are a member of the Task Force for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research. Here at home, we have launched programs to promote integration and social cohesion of Canadians from all backgrounds."

The Canadian Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre (FSWC) also praised the government for becoming the document's first official signatory.

In a statement, Avi Benlolo, president and CEO said his organization applauded the government's "principled leadership" on the issue.

"With the exceptional and pernicious rise of antisemitism throughout the world, the Ottawa Protocol sets an example for other nations to follow," Benlolo said. "This announcement is particularly meaningful as Jews around the world watch in sadness as the racist Durban III conference in New York provides yet one more international forum for attacking the Jewish people, while here in Canada we read about another antisemitic incident in which a swastika was carved on an Edmonton hill."

Winnipeg day school enrolment lags

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This community's Jewish population is on the rise – it may be as high as 16,500, at last report – but that isn't being reflected in a corresponding increase in enrolment in Jewish day school programs.

For the fourth year in a row, attendance at Brock Corydon Elementary School, a public school in south Winnipeg (where the bulk of the Jewish population now lives) with a Hebrew-language bilingual program, is down substantially.

For years, the program was filled to capacity with about 180 students. Two years ago, for the first time, that figure dropped – by about 50 students. Last year, enrolment declined further – to 136, including a kindergarten class of 12. This fall, attendance stands at 122 – including 12 children in nursery and 16 in kindergarten.

Brock Corydon School is in the Winnipeg One School Division, Winnipeg's largest school division (there are another six school divisions in the suburbs). Brock Corydon principal Ira Udow said overall enrolment is down in the division.

"A number of our families have left the city," he said, "and many of the immigrant families are settling in areas of the city outside the Winnipeg One School Division catchment area."

He adds that most of the newly arrived Israeli families – many of them Russian – are sending their kids to regular public schools.

The Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education's enrolment for this year is virtually the same as last year. Student numbers at the BJE's kindergarten-to-Grade12 Gray Academy of Jewish Education stands at 605, one more than last fall. (Enrolment is, however, up from 572 in 2009.)

"While we have a 96 per cent retention rate from last year," said head of school and CEO Rory Paul, "we had very few new students registered this year. The last couple of years, the number of Jewish immigrants coming to Winnipeg has decreased."

The 43-student Grade 12 class is larger than last year's, he said, while the kindergarten has 46 children registered for this fall.

Gray Academy also has three international students this year – the third year of its international outreach program – from Mexico and Brazil.

Full tuition at the school has been increased to $8,400 per student, said Jack Cipilinski, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's chief financial officer. However, the BJE has a sliding scale based on family income and the number of students per family enrolled.

In north Winnipeg, the struggling Hebrew bilingual program at Margaret Park Elementary School (kindergarten to Grade 6 this year) registered an increase in attendance for a change – but that only brings the Jewish student population at the school up to 46. (Enrolment was 37 last year.) At its peak 20 years ago, the program numbered about 180 students.

Principal Cynthia Dutton said next year might be the last year the program will accept new kindergarten students, barring a dramatic change in enrolment.

"Once again, we only had five students enrolled in kindergarten this year," she says. "The Russian Jewish and Israeli families who are living in our area obviously aren't seeing what they want in our program."

She notes that the Seven Oaks School Division (where the school is located) is committed to keeping the Hebrew bilingual program in operation until all the current students finish Grade 6.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

France honours an Ontario educator

Elias Levy
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The government of France recently recognized Louise Bengualid Lewin, a strong defender and ambassador of the French language in Ontario, with one of its highest honours.

An experienced specialist in teaching French as a second language, Lewin received France's Ordre des Palmes Académiques. Established by Napoleon Bonaparte more than 200 years ago, the award recognizes those working in education, research and technology who have distinguished themselves through their work in the task of educating the young. One of the oldest and most prestigious civil distinctions awarded by the French republic, this academic order is ranked third after the Légion d'Honneur and the Ordre National du Mérite.

Jérôme Cauchard, the consul general of France in Toronto, presented the award to Lewin at a reception at the French Consulate in Toronto earlier this year.

Jérôme Cauchard, consul general of France in Toronto, presents the Ordre des Palmes Académique to Louise Lewin.

Born in Morocco, Lewin settled in Canada in 1965 and has since been recognized for many academic and professional achievements in the field of education. She has a master's of education and a doctorate of philosophy from the University of Toronto, is co-ordinator of the distance education program at York University's Glendon College, director of the Glendon language program and associate dean of the York faculty of education.

Since 2009, Lewin has been the academic director of a student exchange program between Ontario universities and the grandes écoles of the Rhone-Alps region of France. Fifteen Ontario universities and 12 institutes of higher learning in Rhone-Alps participated in the academic program this year. Seventy-five BA and MA Ontario university students will do their upper-level studies in a university or grande école in Rhone-Alps, and 75 French students will do the same thing in an Ontario university.

"This student exchange program has been very successful, but because of the financial constraints, we can't accept more than 75 students at the moment. The year the Ontario students spend in France is recognized in Canada, and they receive credit for the courses they take there. The reverse is also true. France recognizes the year the French students study in Ontario universities," Lewin said in an interview.

This student exchange program has been in existence for 20 years. Its success reflects Lewin's work in arranging the remarkable co-operation between the Ontario universities and the universities in several foreign countries in the last decade.

This year, Lewin created two new programs within the framework of the Ontario-Rhone Alps inter-university program:

1. A summer internship science program for undergraduate, master's and doctorate students, in which the Ontario science students will be able to do an internship in French in a French laboratory and the French students will be able to do their research in English in an Ontario science laboratory.
2. A one-month language program for Ontario students who want to stay in the Rhone-Alps area to improve their knowledge of French and for French students who want to perfect their English in Ontario.

For 40 years, Lewin, a Sephardi who is passionate about the French language, has worked tirelessly to advance the cause of bilingualism in Ontario.

"I'm sorry that Ontario is so little known in Quebec. Many francophone Quebecers are convinced that French is a dying language, on its way to extinction, in Ontario. This province is not well known in Quebec," Lewin said. "A half-million francophones live in Ontario. Ontario Francophonie is very diversified. Since the '60s, francophones who come from France, Belgium, North Africa... have joined the native Franco-Ontarians of North Bay, Enders Falls... in the Ontario francophone family.

"What has always amazed me is the Franco-Ontarians' perseverance in preserving and passing on their linguistic and cultural heritage. They wanted their children to study in French."

Married to an anglophone, Lewin passed on to her two children her "unconditional love" of French language and culture...

"My children regularly use French in their work. A language can't survive if one doesn't transmit it with love, devotion and conviction," she said.

In presenting the award to Lewin, Cauchard praised Lewin for her teaching excellence and her outstanding involvement in the promotion and transmission of the French language in Ontario and Canadian educational circles.

"You have brilliantly joined the effort to maintain, defend and promote French culture in its many forms, and you have been instrumental in the huge effort to ensure that teaching excellence is maintained... The attraction of a university education in France, which keeps on growing, has certainly been encouraged by the positive image that you present to your students of all nationalities," Cauchard said.

In 2007, York University created the Bourse Louise Lewin, a scholarship in recognition of Lewin's work with Glendon College students in the field of education.

A majority vote by the council – and a unanimous vote by its five permanent members, China, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States – would bestow full UN membership on the Palestinians.

The United States has vowed to use its veto power to block the application at the council.

The Palestinians currently have observer status at the United Nations.

The pro-Israel community in Canada hailed Harper's stance.

In a Sept. 23. statement, Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), lauded Canadian parliamentarians for their support of Israel on this matter.

"In separating Israeli aspirations (for peace) from Palestinian aspirations (for a state), [the unilateral declaration] directly contravenes the established peace process – and will do nothing to advance either of these two goals," Fogel said.

"This is why Canada is vigorously and unequivocally opposing this resolution at the UN, a principled position that has cross-party support on Parliament Hill. Both the Conservatives under Prime Minister Harper and the Liberals under party Leader Bob Rae have taken a strong stand against the UN bid, and both have urged the Palestinians to abandon this reckless path and return to negotiations with Israel."

Fogel said that the NDP's position remained "unclear."

As of The CJN's Monday deadline, the Security Council was expected to begin informal discussions on the PA's application.

The council's five permanent members are split over the PA's request, so the consultations aren't expected to lead to a formal vote in the near future, UN sources said.

"It's highly likely that the consultations will continue for some weeks," said the deputy head of one western mission to the United Nations. "The Palestinian application is considered an extremely sensitive issue, and in particular, it's a source of controversy between the council's two leading powers, the United States and Russia. Therefore, no quick decision that would produce an official debate and vote is expected."

In his statement, Fogel noted that this scenario provides "a window for the resumption of Israeli-Palestinian negotiations" and enables the United States to avoid using its veto, preventing a direct confrontation at the Security Council "which could be used as an excuse to inflame tensions in the Middle East."

It also allows Abbas to return home "with a symbolic achievement in hand."

In speeches to the General Assembly last Friday, both Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu pleaded their respective cases.

Netanyahu called on Abbas to launch peace talks immediately in New York and said he was ready to "move ahead" within U.S.-backed parameters.

"I extend my hand, the hand of Israel in peace – I hope you will grasp that," Netanyahu said. "If we genuinely want peace, let us meet in this building."

Meanwhile Abbas had reiterated in his speech his precondition that Israel freeze all settlement building.

Family of Montrealer killed in bombing not attending trial

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The father of a Jewish Montrealer killed last April in the bombing of a café in Marrakesh, Morocco, has no intention of travelling there to witness the ongoing trial of the nine alleged perpetrators, a family friend told The CJN.

Seventeen people from six countries were killed in the April 28 bomb blast on the city's popular Djeema El-Fna square.

Among them were Michal Zekry Wizman, 30, of Montreal, and her husband, Messod Wizman, 32. They had travelled to Morocco over the Passover holidays to visit with Messod's parents in Casablanca.

The couple was married in Montreal four years ago and then moved to Shanghai, China. A son, David, 3, who had been travelling with his parents, was not with them at the time of the attack.

Zekry Wizman was reportedly five months pregnant when she was killed.

According to news reports last week, "bereaved relatives" were among those attending the resumption of the trial, with began at the end of June but was postponed in order to allow the prosecution to ready its case.

But a source who is a family friend said that Zekry Wizman's father, Jacques Zekry, was away from Montreal and in another country when the trial resumed and had no intention of attending the proceedings personally.

The chief suspect, Adil El-Atmani, and the other defendants face the death penalty if convicted. Police have described the suspects as "admirers of Al Qaeda," if not actual members of the terror group, and allege that El-Atmani, in disguise, left two bomb-laden bags on the café terrace and detonated them from a mobile phone.

Authorities initially believed the attack might have been carried out by an "Islamic Maghreb" Al Qaeda faction.

Zekry Wizman was a physiotherapist who graduated from École Maïmonide, Concordia University and the Université de Montréal. The Zekry family moved to Montreal from Israel when Michal was a child.

At the time of the bombing, Rabbi Sholom Greenberg, the Chabad rabbi in Shanghai, described the couple as "special people, generous, with pure souls."

Liberal MP Irwin Cotler noted at the time that his special adviser, Judith Abitan, "knew [Zekry Wizman] well."

That made, "an international tragedy a very personal one," he said, "as once again we witness the slaughter of innocents in a… terrorist bombing."

Lieberman meets Russian Jews in B.C.

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Before heading to the United Nations General Assembly in New York City, Israel's foreign minister Avigdor Lieberman met with members of the Russian Jewish community in Vancouver.

Speaking Sept. 19 to a crowd of 300 at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver, Lieberman expressed pleasure at the number of young people in the audience and their enthusiasm for the State of Israel.

Alex Kivritsky, a member of the community designated by the Israeli Embassy to co-ordinate the talk, said some 20 protesters showed up outside the centre, demonstrating with banners.

Kivritsky said Lieberman came to Vancouver because he knew the city has a very active Russian-speaking Jewish community, one with its own radio station that broadcasts five days a week.

"Lieberman was very pleased with the turnout, the intelligent questions that came from the crowd and their eagerness to know how they could help establish the goals of the State of Israel," Kivritsky said.

Volunteering is good for your health

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

Does volunteering help stave off dementia? A groundbreaking study at Baycrest's Rotman Research Unit is measuring the impact of volunteering on the physical, emotional and mental effects of aging.

Now in its third year, the study has already produced startling results indicating that complex volunteer roles can improve seniors' minds, bodies and moods.

"We knew there were certain lifestyle factors like challenging occupations that could reduce the incidence of dementia and the effects of aging in seniors," says Dr. Nicole Anderson, the study's lead researcher. "Since many people treat volunteering like a job, we wanted to study whether volunteer jobs could be a protective factor, too."

To put her hypothesis to the test, Anderson and her team launched the BRAVO program (Baycrest Research About Volunteering among Older Adults) in conjunction with Baycrest's volunteer services department. The project, which is jointly run by scientists and 30 senior volunteers, measures volunteers age 55 and up before, midway, and after 12 months of volunteering at Baycrest. Participants were assessed to see the impact of their volunteer roles on their physical, cognitive and psychosocial health.

Though the study still has two years to go, results so far seem to confirm Anderson's hypothesis. Presenting her findings from June to the BRAVO team on Sept. 22, Anderson found that people who took on complex volunteer roles fared better than their non-active or "mildly complex" counterparts. Physically, she found that grip strength, a proxy measure for overall health, was much better in participants who engaged in physically complex volunteer positions.

Similarly, volunteers who undertook positions with higher social complexity reported lower rates of depression and a more positive affect. "I became part of a network of doctors, patients, staff and volunteers that were a rich source of inspiration," says study participant Jim Pullen. "The support, kindness and encouragement of my fellow volunteers was of great benefit to me." Pullen served as a weekly "Dear Abbey" discussion leader and volunteered in the palliative care department.

On the cognitive front, people with more cognitively complex positions reported fewer cognitive failures (like walking into a room and forgetting why they're there) and tested better in terms of visual memory.

"Before I retired, I had a very challenging and busy job as a lawyer," says Elaine Harris, a senior volunteer on the BRAVO team. "So I see my volunteer work as an occupation, and I've been able to apply a lot of the critical-thinking skills I used as a lawyer in my role here. For instance, I helped develop a website for this project – can you imagine, me, a web developer?"

The study also involved more qualitative measures of the impact of volunteering, such as questionnaires and open-ended interviews. According to their findings, participants were engaging in volunteer work because they wanted to give back, feel better about themselves, stay active or find purpose.

"Especially after retirement, people want to continue to learn," says Syrelle Bernstein, director of volunteer services at Baycrest. "I think people are looking for volunteer positions that keep them challenged and put their skills to good use."

It's not just study participants who've benefited from the project. Members of the 30-person volunteer leadership team seem to have experienced many of the benefits themselves. "You have to keep busy or it all slows down," says Zel Bocknek, who starting volunteering at Baycrest back in 2005. "I'm over 150 and look how active I am," he jokes.

Dr. Tony Fattal, another volunteer leading the study, says, "It's amazing for us, because it's a study with strong scientific integrity, but it's executed largely by volunteers. We do the testing, interviewing for qualitative data, marketing, recruiting participants, design the website.

"Just being part of it is so inspiring, especially with the tremendous calibre of our team. There's a lot of anecdotal evidence that told us that volunteering was good for you, but until this study, no one could tell you how good."

Anderson says that while many other longitudinal studies found health benefits associated with volunteering, the BRAVO project is unique in using a combination of objective measures and qualitative ones to measure the impact of volunteer roles. "We are also the first to consider for the complexity of the volunteer positions," she says. So the data so far suggests that greater complexity confers benefits."

For more information about the BRAVO program or to enrol in the study, visit research.baycrest.org/bravo or phone 416-785-2500, ext. 2577.

New state-of-the-art facility attests to Sutton Group Admiral's record growth

Murray Goldkind
Broker of Record

This is one company that doesn't just talk about growth; it shows evidence of it month over month, year over year, not only in the number of agents and brokers it employs, but also in the services it offers them.

Sutton Group-Admiral Realty Inc., Brokerage and the Goldkinds are especially proud of their newly, under-construction 15,000 square foot facility. The new state-of-the-art premises located on Centre Street in Thornhill will provide additional cutting-edge services and facilities that Admiral agents need, and will allow them to provide and further enhance the top level of service that they provide to their clients.

This is the Sutton Group Admiral formula in action: maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle for its agents and brokers.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team, which now numbers over 250 agents and brokers, has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to further its presence in the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Broker of Record Murray Goldkind prides himself on his ability to read and respond to the needs of home buyers and sellers. Says Murray: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't." And implicit in this value, he notes, is the quality of service provided by the broker or agent. "If you have to do more than say, 'I'll take the red one,' we're not doing our job."

In its dual capacity as reseller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol Goldkind, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work "24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

Going around the world to break the fast

Sybil Kaplan
Special to The CJN

For most of us, breaking the fast has its own set of traditions. Ashkenazim usually break the fast with something salty, like herring, because they believe fish restores salt lost by the body while fasting. Herring also was the cheapest fish in eastern Europe, where the custom originated.

Egg and cheese dishes – dairy products in general – are popular among Ashkenazim for the first foods after Yom Kippur.

Some eastern European Jews break the fast with a German sweet roll called shnekem, from the German word for snails, because of its coiled shape. The yeast dough containing milk and sour cream is rolled out, brushed with melted butter and sprinkled with a cinnamon sugar, raisin and nut filling, then rolled up, cut into slices and baked.

Gil Marks writes in The World of Jewish Desserts that central European Jews ate cheese kuchen, a coffee cake, for the meal following Yom Kippur. German Jews also ate erstesternen, a cinnamon star cookie, so called because stars were the sign of the end of the fast day.

Zimbabwe Jews break the fast with juice, traditional rolls with oil called rusks, oil biscuits and cheese. Sweets include almond and honey turnovers and sponge cake. Later they dine on a meal of cold chicken, fried fish, chicken soup and other sweets.

The Jews of South Africa, whose origins were in Europe, have babke, a sweet milk bread with almonds and raisins, which originated in Poland. They also drink soda water, milk or lemon tea. Later they have a meal starting with pickled herring and lemon fish.

Typical among South African Jews whose ancestors came from the island of Rhodes is breaking the fast with milk made from melon pips, bread with olive oil, sponge cake, honey and almond turnovers, and rusks.

Others break the fast with cold chicken, chicken soup and sesame biscuits, followed by almond sponge cake with syrup or marzipan. (Marzipan is a sweet mixture of almond paste, sugar and egg whites often tinted with food colouring and moulded into forms such as fruits and animals.) Layered phyllo pastry with almonds and honey also may be served.

Among Sephardim and Middle Eastern Jews, a light snack is followed by a heavier meal. For example, some Syrian, Iraqi and Egyptian Jews break the fast with cardamom coffee cake. Some Iraqis drink milk, then have the cake or a cardamom-almond cookie called hagadi badah, Marks writes in The World of Jewish Desserts. Afterward they have a big meal that includes teebeet, a stuffed whole chicken with rice that has been left to cook over a low flame all Yom Kippur day.

Pan dulce, a sweet yeast bread in loaf form or rolls, is served by some Sephardim before and after the fast, Marks notes in his book. Marks also writes that the Jews of India for the meal following Yom Kippur have a semolina-filled turnover called singara or kushli, and sutlach, a Middle Eastern rice flour pudding.

Some Yemenites break the fast with ginger cake or watermelon. Then they drink coffee and eat cookies. Afterward they have more of the broth from before the fast or another Yemenite soup.

Edda Servi Machlin, author of the cookbook Classic Italian Jewish Cooking, among others, recounts that her Italian family drinks vermouth and then eats a special, oval-shaped bread to break the fast. They then enjoy a meal with soup and pasta, chicken, fish, stewed fennel, cold noodles with sauce, sweet cakes and fruit.

Marks writes that Italians typically break the fast with il bolio, an Italian sweet yeast bread.

Nicholas Stavroulakis, who wrote The Cookbook of the Jews of Greece, says that Greek Jews prepare interesting drinks to break the fast. One is made with grenadine, another with almonds, another with lemons; and one has melon seeds, water, sugar and almond extract or rosewater.

Rachel Dalvin, who has researched about the Jews of Ioannina, Greece, shares the fact that these Jews broke the fast with avgolemono, chicken-lemon soup, and a variety of stuffed vegetables that were common in Turkish cookery and acquired because Turkey occupied that part of Greece for centuries.

Some Moroccan Jews break the fast with fijuelas, a deep-fried pastry soaked in sweet syrup. They may also drink arak, an anise-flavoured liqueur. Later they have coffee with milk, cake and cookies. Still later they have harera, a special thick soup with chicken and ground vegetables.

Here are some special recipes to break the fast from Olive Trees and Honey by Gil Marks, a cookbook of traditional Jewish vegetarian dishes from Jews around the world that can be prepared ahead.

PERSIAN YOGURT AND CUCUMBER SOUP

2 to 5 garlic cloves
1 tsp. table salt or 2 tsp. kosher salt
4 cups plain yogurt
1 cup milk or 1/2 cup buttermilk and 1/2 cup water
1 to 2 tbsp. olive oil (optional)
4 cups peeled, seeded, diced or grated cucumbers
1/2 cup chopped scallions
1/4 to 1/2 cup chopped fresh dill, cilantro or mint or 6 tbsp. chopped fresh tarragon plus 3 tbsp. fresh dill
2 chopped hard-boiled eggs or 1/2 cup chopped walnuts

Mash garlic and salt into a paste in a bowl. In a large bowl, blend yogurt, milk and oil. Stir in garlic, cucumbers and scallions. Refrigerate for at least 1 hour.

Five minutes before serving, stir in herbs. Pour into serving bowls and garnish with eggs or walnuts. Serve with crusty bread or pita. Makes 6-8 servings.

ITALIAN COLD PASTA IN EGG-LEMON SAUCE

Sauce
2 large eggs
2 large egg yolks
1/3 cup fresh lemon juice
2 tbsp. flour or 1 tbsp. cornstarch
1 tsp. salt or 2 tsp. kosher salt
2 tsp. sugar (optional)
2 cups boiling vegetable soup or water

Pasta Ingredients:
1 lb. tagliolini/taglierini or thin egg noodles such as linguine
1 tsp. salt
1/3 cup olive oil
2 tbsp. fresh parsley (optional)

Beat eggs, egg yolks and lemon juice in a saucepan. Whisk a little of the egg mixture in a bowl with the flour or cornstarch to make a paste. Stir it back into the egg mixture. Add salt and sugar if using. Gradually beat in hot soup or water. Cook over medium heat, stirring continually with a wooden spoon until smooth and thick, about 8 minutes. Remove from heat and continue to stir for 1 minute. Pour into a bowl, cover with plastic wrap and let cool.

Bring a large pot of water to a boil. Add salt then noodles and stir. Return and bring to a boil and cook 7 to 10 minutes. Drain. Place in a bowl and toss with olive oil. Let cool at least 30 minutes.

Mix noodles with sauce and garnish with parsley. Makes 5-6 servings.

MY FAVOURITE NO-HERRING TASTE APPETIZER

Though I do not like herring, once I tasted this dish more than 20 years ago, I was won over and make it often – and not just for breaking the fast.

2 cups herring in wine
1/2 cup sour cream
1/2 cup mayonnaise
2 tbsp. dill
2 tsp. sugar
chopped scallions

Wash and pat dry herring. Place in a blender. Add sour cream, mayonnaise, dill, sugar and scallions. Blend a second or so just until herring is pureed slightly. Spoon into a serving dish. Serve with crackers or pita chips. Makes 4-6 servings.

UN vote on Palestinian state to be delayed

Shlomo Shamir
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — UN Security Council members were to convene on Monday for informal consultations on the Palestinian Authority's application for admission to the United Nations as a full member state.

Under UN rules, a new member state can be admitted only on the Security Council's recommendation. If the council recommends acceptance, the General Assembly must then vote on whether to ratify the decision.

Currently, the council's five permanent members are split over the PA's request, so the consultations are not expected to lead to a formal vote anytime in the near future, UN sources said.

"It's highly likely that the consultations will continue for some weeks," said the deputy head of one western mission to the United Nations. "The Palestinian application is considered an extremely sensitive issue, and in particular, it's a source of controversy between the council's two leading powers, the United States and Russia. Therefore, no quick decision that would produce an official debate and vote is expected."

However, the diplomat added, the rules allow an unofficial consultation to be declared official on the spot and without warning, albeit this happens only rarely.

The pace of the informal consultations and the timing of the meetings are generally dictated by the council's five permanent members. Because these five have veto power over resolutions, the council would usually prefer to find a formula they can all live with, if that is possible, rather than proceeding immediately to a vote in which one of the five is certain to cast a veto.

However, this process can result in substantial delays. As an example, officials in New York cited the fate of a draft resolution proposing sanctions on Syria that France submitted six weeks ago. Due to Russia's opposition, the council has yet to hold a single official debate on the matter, a situation French Foreign Minister Alain Juppe recently described as scandalous.

Informal consultations are always held behind closed doors, and no one except the council members' official representatives are allowed to attend. Nothing said in such a consultation is binding.

In related news, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu expressed his "disappointment" on Sunday with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' speech to the UN General Assembly, during an interview with the NBC news show Meet the Press.

Celebration and cynicism in Ramallah

Lia Ja Gradstein
JTA

RAMALLAH, West Bank — A larger-than-life sky-blue chair with the word "Palestine" dominates the centre of Manara Square in downtown Ramallah.

The Palestinian flag, a national symbol once banned by Israel, flies everywhere. Long banners of flags crisscross the square, huge flags decorate the sides of buildings, and even police cars sport flags. Nationalist music blares from loudspeakers.

The chair, symbolizing Palestinians' hoped-for acceptance as a state by the United Nations, is empty for now. Public opinion in Ramallah, the de facto Palestinian financial and political capital, is divided over whether the Palestinians' UN bid for statehood will make any difference on the ground.

Mahmoud Abbas

Some, like Walid Nasser, a manager of 17 radio stations in the West Bank, says that Palestinians are now on the road to an independent state.

"It's a legal step and it's very important for our own real state," Nasser told JTA in Manara Square on Friday, the day Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas submitted the Palestinians' bid for statehood to the United Nations. "There has never been a UN document that registers Palestine as a state. It's a huge step forward for the Palestinian people."

Nasser did not seem bothered by the promised American veto of a Security Council resolution calling for the recognition of Palestine.

"We don't care – let the U.S. be the only one of 130 nations opposing a Palestinian state," he said. "We deserve a state just like Israel deserves a state. They suffered a lot in the past, but so did we. We want a state that will live in peace with all of its neighbours, including Israel."

Others say that a Palestinian state would be a chance to right historic wrongs. Qais Adel, 44, a soft-spoken waiter at a downtown Ramallah restaurant, stood outside a grocery store with his wife.

"I was born in Nablus in 1967, and all of my life has been under Israeli occupation," he said, putting his grocery bags on the ground to rest for a moment. "For years now, Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayad has been laying the groundwork for a state, and now we are ready. Israel already has a state. Now we want a state within the 1967 borders."

The 1967 borders would mean an Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and eastern Jerusalem. Israel withdrew from the Gaza Strip in 2005. Those are the same borders that President Barack Obama cited earlier this year as the basis for negotiations, with mutually agreed-upon swaps of territory. But in his speech to the UN General Assembly last Wednesday, there was neither mention of the 1967 lines nor a call to Israel to freeze settlement expansion.

In New York, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said a future Palestinian state can't have Jewish settlers in it. Some 300,000 Jewish settlers live in the West Bank, not including eastern Jerusalem. Even assuming mutually agreed-upon land swaps that would keep settlement blocs under Israeli control, West Bank settlements that are home to tens of thousands of Israelis would be left in areas allotted to a Palestinian state under almost any conceivable peace deal.

In Ramallah, many Palestinians are doubtful that the UN gambit will change anything in their daily lives.

Yahya Eid, 23, sat on a plastic chair next to a small stand selling tea and coffee. He said he works 18 hours a day, either at the stand or at a small restaurant he owns. He graduated from university last year with a degree in computer science but couldn't find work in his field.

He smiled cynically as he surveyed the decorated square, which was mostly quiet on Friday, while some flashpoints, like the Kalandiya checkpoint between Ramallah and Jerusalem, saw clashes between Israeli soldiers and Palestinian protesters. One Palestinian was killed in a clash between Israeli settlers and Palestinians near the Palestinian village of Qusra.

"If Israel and the U.S. don't want us to have a state, it's not going to happen," Eid said. "And what about President Obama's speech to the UN? All he said was, 'Get back to negotiating.'"

Asked whether the armed Palestinian police in the streets of Ramallah and the flags don't already provide a feeling of statehood, Eid said, "Sure, it feels like a state during the day. But at 10 p.m. our police have to get off the streets and Israeli soldiers can come in if they want to arrest anyone. What kind of state is that?"

Despite this perspective, Eid said he believes there eventually will be an independent Palestinian state – he's just not sure how long it will take.

Spain supports 'homeland for the Jewish people'

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Spain's Foreign Minister Trinidad Jiménez presented a new national policy for the Palestinian-Israeli conflict on Saturday, declaring for the first time that Israel is the homeland of the Jews and saying that the issue of Palestinian refugees should be solved in such a way that it does not compromise Israel's current demographic makeup of a Jewish majority.

Jiménez's speech before the UN General Assembly is particularly dramatic in light of the fact that Spain is considered the leading European Union country to support Palestinian rights. Adopting such a pro-Israel stance may lead other countries to follow suit.

The foreign minister stressed Spain's commitment to Israel "as the embodiment of the project to create a homeland for the Jewish people." She recounted how, since Israel's inception, it has suffered through many wars and terrorism against its people, adding that Israel's security is a top priority for Spain.

Trinidad Jiménez

Jimenez called for the establishment of a Palestinian state along 1967 lines, with agreed swaps and Jerusalem as a shared capital with Israel.

"The security of Israel and Palestine will require effective guarantees in the future peace agreement, including a possible international participation, should the parties request it," she said. She made clear that the best way to achieve such a deal would be through a negotiated peace treaty.

The Spanish foreign minister also addressed "the painful drama of the Palestinian refugees," presenting a new policy on this issue as well. She said the refugee problem should be agreed upon by both Israel and the Palestinians, while still preserving Israel's character as a Jewish state.

Spain supports the General Assembly's granting Palestine the status of a non-member observer state, Jiménez said, explaining that the international community must show that it is committed to the creation of an independent Palestinian state.

"Effective, sustainable peace can only be achieved through negotiations between the parties," she stressed, clarifying that "Spain believes that the Palestinians could find in this new status a stimulus for the prompt resumption of negotiations."

She also warned that this new status should not be abused or used in a way that is incompatible with the spirit of negotiations.

Jiménez spoke of Spain's longstanding support for the Palestinians' struggle against the occupation; however, she also emphasized Spain and the Jewish people's centuries-long relationship.

"Spain's identity cannot be understood without her Arab and Jewish heritage," she said.

Netanyahu told the show's moderator, David Gregory, that he was "trying to move forward" the peace process through negotiations, and that the "core of the conflict" lies with the Palestinians' persistent "refusal to accept Israel's existence."

When asked about threats facing Israel, Netanyahu answered that he is responsible for the "fate of the one and only Jewish state," and he seeks to "erect the wall against insatiable crocodile of Islamism, before it devours us for breakfast."

Netanyahu further rebuffed several Republican presidential contenders' claims that Obama is "throwing Israel under the bus" by saying that America supports Israel in "unprecedented ways" and that this support is "expressed by any person who happens to be in the White House."

Netanyahu also commented on former president Bill Clinton's claim that the Israeli prime minister is not interested in peace, telling Gregory that Clinton's successor, president George W. Bush, knows well "how the Palestinian leaders moved away from the Israeli prime ministers' proposals. They didn't come, and now they go to the UN."

On Monday, President Shimon Peres said that Abbas is the best Palestinian leader Israel could work with toward the goal of resuming the peace process.

"I call on my friend Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who I respect and acknowledge as the best leader Israel will work with, to return to the negotiating table," Peres said at a Rosh Hashanah ceremony with foreign diplomats.

Peres pressed that peace between the Israelis and the Palestinians is possible. "Let's decide the facts in the Middle East reality that is changing before our eyes," he said. He also called on both sides to adhere to the timetable the Mideast Quartet – the United States, Russia, the United Nations and the European Union – presented for renewing negotiations and reaching a peace agreement.

"There is a clear majority in both nations for the principle of two states for two peoples, and now that the speeches are over, it is time for the real work on the ground," Peres said. "We must translate the declarations to reality."

Abbas, however, called Netanyahu the most inflexible leader he had ever known, in an interview with the pan-Arab newspaper al-Sharq al-Awsat.

"Benjamin Netanyahu's ideological positions do not allow him to advance forward," Abbas said.

Former journalist chosen to head Labor party

Jonathan Lis
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The Labor party is Kadima's natural partner for a Zionist path to a future of peace and fair society, opposition leader Tzipi Livni told MK Shelly Yachimovich last Thursday when she called to congratulate Yachimovich for being elected the new leader of Israel's Labor Party.

Shelly Yachimovich

Speaking to reporters, Livni said, "I see the Labor party as our [Kadima's] natural partner for a Zionist path to a future of peace and fair society. That is the common goal of political leaders now and in the future, in light of the challenges standing before the State of Israel."

Livni and Yachimovich made plans to meet in the near future.

Yachimovich, 51, was elected the new leader of Israel's Labor party on Sept. 21, in a close race against runner-up Amir Peretz.

Yachimovich is the second woman to take on the role in the history of the party, after former prime minister Golda Meir.

"This is a new window of opportunity to raise up the Labor party," Yachimovich said.

Labor MK Amir Peretz, who won 45 per cent of the vote, congratulated Yachimovich, saying, "I wish you success, and hope that there is collaboration so that we can deal with all the issues that are important to the State of Israel."

Labor MK Isaac Herzog, who finished third in the first round of party elections, congratulated the new leader. "Great challenges lie ahead. It is right for us to hold hands and assist you as much as possible," he said.

Yachimovich's first task will be to prevent a further split in the Labor party, and to recruit her political rivals to co-operate with her. The only Knesset member of the Labor party, to support her candidacy was MK Avishai Braverman.

About 61 per cent of eligible Labor party members turned out to vote for a new party leader in an election pitting Peretz, a former party leader and former chairman of the Histadrut labour federation, against former journalist Yachimovich.

The pair survived a first round of voting that knocked two other candidates, Herzog and Amram Mitzna, another former party leader, out of the running.

Iran must hand over AMIA bombing suspects: Argentina

JTA

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine President Cristina Fernandez said her country is receptive to Iran's request for dialogue about the bombing of a Buenos Aires Jewish centre, but she said the Islamic republic must hand over the suspects.

"We insist that Iran hand over the suspects of the AMIA atrocity," Fernandez said last week during her address to the United Nations General Assembly. "The proposal of dialogue that we received from Iranian government is a change of attitude, but does not satisfy the Argentinian request, although this is a proposal to dialogue that Argentina cannot reject."

The response was the first by Fernandez since Iran proposed a "constructive dialogue" on the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish centre, which killed 85 and injured hundreds. The proposal came July 16, two days before the 17th anniversary of the attack.

Fernandez had invited leaders of the Jewish umbrella organization DAIA and of the AMIA, as well as a group of family and relatives of the centre's bombing victims, to accompany her to New York for the speech.

Argentina has accused the Iranian government of directing the bombing and the Lebanon-based terror group Hezbollah of carrying it out, but no arrests have been made in the case. Six Iranians have been on the Interpol international police agency's most wanted list since 2007 in connection with the bombing, including the current Iranian defence minister, Gen. Ahmed Vahidi.

AMIA President Angel Barman told JTA that dialogue could be the way to bring the Iranians to justice.

Argentina's ambassador to the UN was expected to remain in the auditorium during Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's address to the General Assembly on Sept. 21.

During her address, Fernandez also reiterated Argentine support for a Palestinian state, which she originally expressed last December.

The Simon Wiesenthal Center criticized what it termed Argentine "confusion in dealing with terrorism."

"To recognize Palestine without also demanding security for the Jewish state of Israel and a Palestinian commitment against Hamas and its accomplices is an appeasement of terrorism and undermines Argentina's demands for justice from Iran in the AMIA affair," said the Wiesenthal Center's Latin America director, Buenos Aires-based Sergio Widder.

Israel Briefs

Egypt bans lulav sales

Egypt has banned the export of palm fronds to Israel and Jewish communities abroad, leading to fears of a lulav shortage on Sukkot. Israel had imported about 700,000 palm fronds a year in the run-up to Sukkot, which is about 40 per cent of annual demand, Ha'aretz reported. Another 700,000 of the two million lulavs used in Diaspora Jewish communities also come from Egypt. The palms are grown in the Sinai Peninsula. Israel's Agricultural Ministry said it's encouraging local palm farmers to increase production. The ministry also issued special licenses to import lulavs from Jordan, Gaza and Spain.

Honey price high

The price of Israeli honey is soaring because of "outrageous" customs duties that prevent competition from imports, a new study says. The Jerusalem Institute for Market Studies urges ending high tariffs on honey to increase supplies of imported honey and the number of countries it's imported from. Meanwhile, the market share of Israel's Kibbutz Yad Mordechai honey is more than 50 per cent. The cost of Israeli honey rose 26 per cent from 2005 to 2010, the independent, non-profit economic think-tank said. Its study said Israeli honey costs 3-1/2 times as much as in the United States and is twice as expensive as in Britain. Canada, Mexico, Argentina and China offer honey for export at 15 per cent of the price of Israeli honey.

Thugs condemned

Two leading West Bank rabbis have condemned attacks on Palestinians by right-wing activists and called on settlers to turn in perpetrators. Rabbi Aharon Lichtenstein, 78, and Rabbi Yaakov Medan, 61, heads of the Har Etzion Yeshiva in the Gush Etzion bloc of the West Bank near Bethlehem, distributed a statement throughout the West Bank saying that the activities "have crossed all red lines."

Aliyah rises

Some 21,300 new immigrants have moved to Israel since last Rosh Hashanah, an increase of 19 per cent over last year, the Jewish Agency said.

Palestinian calls for ethnic cleansing ignored

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Maen Areikat, the Palestine Liberation Organization's "ambassador" to the United States, announced this month that the Palestinian state, for which the PLO is requesting recognition by the United Nations, must be free of Jews. This presumably means that the areas that the PLO considers to be part of the Palestinian state will have to be cleared of all Jews residing there at the present time. In other words, the area must be ethnically cleansed.

Those nations who intend to vote for the admission of this Palestinian state to the UN, at the UN General Assembly or at the UN Security Council, will be voting for such an ethnic cleansing operation.

There may be some UN member states, among the Muslim nations, that are at present clean of any Jewish presence on their territory and intend to keep it that way. Adding a country to UN membership that is determined to rid itself of Jews and keep its territory free of Jews presumably presents no moral problem for them when the time comes to vote – and may even be a welcome addition to their "club."

Opinion

But, what about the other UN member states? What about the countries of Europe who not so long ago, under German rule in World War II, were cleaned and sometimes helped to clean their countries of Jews? Does this vote not represent a moral dilemma for them? That will be interesting to watch.

That the Palestinians – whether those led by PA President Mahmoud Abbas, who is submitting the application for membership at the UN, or those led by Hamas in Gaza, who are opposed to this application – do not want to see any Jews in their land is disgusting, but not surprising. What is at first sight surprising is that they believe that such an expectation is actually realistic, that it is doable.

They are possibly encouraged by the fact that some on the Israeli left call for the uprooting of Jews who reside beyond the Israeli-Jordanian armistice lines of March 1949.

No less surprising is that the present administration in Washington, although opposed to Abbas' initiative at the UN, seems to have bought into this concept, with its insistence that all Israeli building activity beyond the armistice lines must cease. Some of the European nations, probably without giving the implications of this demand a second thought, seem to be going along with the views of Washington on this subject.

But actually, there is no reason to be surprised. Ariel Sharon, as Israel's prime minister in 2006, carried out such an ethnic cleansing operation in the large Jewish settlement bloc in Gush Katif, using the Israel Defence Forces to forcibly uproot 8,000 Jewish farmers from their lands. If it could be done in the Gaza Strip, why should it not be done in Judea and Samaria and also in east Jerusalem, possibly mitigated by some land "swaps" with the Palestinians?

As a matter of fact, Sharon's successor as prime minister, Ehud Olmert, in the heady days when he still believed that he was leading Israel to victory during his unfortunate Second Lebanon War adventure, said that his next step after his "victory" in Lebanon would be the uprooting of Jewish settlements in Judea and Samaria. Of course, the miserable ending of the Lebanon operation changed all that. Unquestionably, however, Sharon's "disengagement" in Gaza had left its mark upon the expectations and subsequent demands of the Palestinians.

Moshe Arens

Encouraged by the declarations from Washington, Abbas has refused to negotiate with Israel unless all building activity beyond the 1949 armistice lines ceases, and unless Israel is prepared for an agreement that would be based on these armistice lines. So now he is going to the UN.

The irony of the situation is that Sharon's "disengagement" in Gaza, which many believed would be a step toward Israeli-Palestinian reconciliation, has actually become a stumbling block, planting the idea in the minds of the Palestinians that ethnic cleansing of Jews from the areas beyond the armistice lines is realistic, while all those who are acquainted with the Israeli political scene know that what happened in Gush Katif is not going to happen again.

It is this Palestinian misconception, more than anything else, that has prevented the resumption of Israeli-Palestinian negotiations during the past two years. The Palestinian initiative at the UN marks the indefinite postponement of such negotiations for the time being.

Moshe Arens has served as Israel's defence minister and foreign minister.

Our amazing Alaskan adventure

Masada Siegel
Special to The CJN

Feature

A look of horror crossed my mom's face. We stared at the petite woman standing in the pouring rain, as she raised her hands over her head and made menacing faces.

"If you see a bear, put your hands over your head and start saying, 'Bear go away.' If we do this all together, then he'll be afraid and walk away, well, hopefully" said Tammy Smith, our hiking guide in Denali National Park.

The mud was sticky, the incline steep and droplets of rain stuck to our coats.

My mom said, "Masada, I don't think this is for me."

I smiled, "That's nice, now let's go."

We grabbed walking sticks and set off, walking single file behind our guide on the Triple Lakes Trail.

Denali National Park in Alaska is a dream destination. The scenery is majestic in both the rain and sunshine. It's pristine and rugged, and the magic only escalates when viewing a grisly bear at close range. (We saw a few, but out of a tour-bus window.)

We were on an Alaskan adventure. It was my Mother's Day gift, albeit an early one! It is one of the commandments to honour your mother, so I took it a step further and decided to spend quality, fun time with mine. In a mere three weeks, we were going to fly-fish, hike glaciers and explore non-stop, until our Holland America cruise, where we would be pampered endlessly and treated like queens.

We landed in Fairbanks and worked our way south, experiencing every mode of transportation available: planes, trains, automobiles, canoes, helicopters and a ship.

Fairbanks took us by surprise. It's charming and filled with unique places such as the Fountainhead Antique Auto Museum at Wedgewood resort. This living museum encompasses 78 vehicles ranging from the obscure such as the Hertel and Argonne to the legendary Peerless and Packard. It's a walk through both automotive history and America. Many of the shiny cars were paired with figurines wearing the fashion of the time period.

After exploring the fabulous ice museum and hopping on a riverboat cruise, before dinner at the famous Pump House restaurant and saloon, we stopped by Congregation Or HaTzafon.

Fairbanks has a small but vibrant Jewish community. The city was founded in 1902, and in 1904, a Jewish community began with the arrival of Robert Bloom, a Lithuanian, who came from Ireland via the Klondike in 1898. He ran a general store from 1906 to 1941 and contributed not only to the Fairbanks Jewish Community but was also one of the founders of the University of Alaska.

Housed at the University of Alaska is a jewel, the Museum of the North. It's small but sophisticated, and it showcases the history of Alaska and local artists and is definitely worth a visit.

The next day, we headed to the Arctic Circle with the Northern Alaska Tour Company. Our first moose sighting was only an hour into the drive. The famous Alaskan pipeline rose and fell, guiding us along the way where we stopped to pick wild blueberries and literally bounce on the squishy arctic tundra. In remote places, we met people who lived by nature's rules, mainly fishing and hunting for their sustenance.

Alaska, where about 6,000 Jewish people live, has a long history of a strong relationship with Israel. Rabbi Yosef Greenberg of Anchorage explained how in 1949 Alaskan bush pilots risked their own lives to rescue thousands of Yemenite Jews and fly them, in the dark of night, to Israel during Operation Magic Carpet.

"The planes at the time could make the trip from Yemen to Israel in 10 hours, however, could only hold enough fuel for nine hours, and there was no country they could stop to refuel," he said. "They had to take fuel on the plane – and refuel it while flying. These planes were at times shot at, but the Alaskan pilots accepted the job. They flew 370 flights, and when Alaska Airlines had to pull out, their pilots carried on with the mission until it was completed."

Additionally, the Alaskan Jewish community, understanding the importance of the continuity of the Jewish religion and culture, is working with native Alaskans to help them preserve their heritage and languages, such as the Na-Dene language

Spending time with Rabbi Greenberg of Chabad of Alaska, who has lived in Alaska for 20 years, was an unexpected treat. He is filled with such a positive energy and light, and listening to him was mesmerizing.

One of the projects he is hoping to complete is the creation of the Alaska Jewish Museum. Chabad is holding a huge gala and fundraiser in Anchorage in November, and film stars Nicholas Cage and John Cusack will be in attendance.

"We need about a million dollars more to complete the museum, so yes, we are looking for a miracle, but miracles do happen," he said, smiling.

Alaska is filled with untamed beauty, exquisite scenery. Our days were filled with non-stop activities, but our trip was coming to a close. Now, I had the look of horror on my face; no more extraordinary adventures – no more pampering on the ship and being lulled to sleep by the gently rocking waves.

Merchant bank entering Israeli investment scene

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Asquith Israel Merchant Bank is a new entrant in the world of Israeli banking, but it's not the kind of financial institution that takes retail deposits and provides home mortgages.

It's a merchant bank that deals in private equity, a vehicle for pooling surplus capital and investing in up-and-coming enterprises, explained Michael Freedman, one of the principals behind the bank.

"We're harkening back to the golden age of the Rothschilds, with an Israeli twist, to combine a pot of our own money with strategic investors on a deal-by-deal basis," Freedman said.

Along with several of his partners, Freedman was recently in Toronto to publicize the bank and meet potential investors. His visit was part of a larger North American tour, which included a stop in Boston.

Michael Freedman

Focusing on affluent members of the Jewish community, Asquith is targeting high-worth individuals and institutional investors who are willing to place a minimum of $150,000 for individuals, $500,000 from institutions, in Israeli companies entering the growth stage.

Unlike venture capital funds and investors who put their money into Israeli start-ups – new companies with more ideas than cash – Asquith is seeking out companies that are more mature, Freedman said.

Funds allocated by Asquith will go to develop a market or expand established companies – "that have already proven they're real" – but which need to take the next step and expand their client base, he said.

Asquith, which officially launches in November, sees itself investing in "mid-tech" firms, such as those in the oil and gas industry or in clean tech. And unlike venture capital firms that look to make a quick exit after investing, Asquith "will stay in the business longer. We're not in for the short term, but we'll stay for seven or eight years and sit on the cash flow," he said.

The partners behind Asquith are well known in the Israeli business community, Freedman continued. One, Eial Diskin has 25 years experience in the software and high-tech sector and is CEO of International Business Development Consultants (IBDC). Diskin worked for 10 years as a senior developer and a development manager and director in New Dimension Software, a start-up that was purchased for $700 million.

Asquith expects to raise up to $20 million for investments, "to give us reasonable firepower," Freedman said.

The brain trust behind the firm has determined it will never take more than a 30 per cent equity stake in a company, but it will assist in finding investors for the remaining ownership stake.

Asquith has been researching investment opportunities and already has "a pipeline of deals" in mind. "We have a good idea where our first... dollars will be employed," Freedman said.

The type of investors Asquith is approaching are those who believe in the firm's business model, who are attracted by Asquith's focus on capital preservation and who are interested in investing in the future of Israel.

The British-born Freedman said the firm is hoping to fill a void in Israeli business by investing in companies that hire workers for the long term. Only 65 per cent of Israelis are employed in small- to medium-sized businesses, unlike Germany where the number is 78 per cent.

"We fill in the gap by investing in companies that hire, including haredim and Arabs," he said.

On his blog, Freedman has criticized "The short-term mentality of Israel's entrepreneurs and venture capital investors" where "funding is targeted at those seeking a quick exit, by those seeking a quick return."

Israel suffers from "a shortage of genuine long-term growth capital, entrenching further the exit-orientated atmosphere, and failing to create stable Israeli-domiciled businesses with the solid employment that they bring," he wrote.

Investing for the long term is good for Israel. It would contribute to a more stable economy and reduce the role of government, he said.

Panel calls for economic divestment

Ilan Lior and Rotem Starkman
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The government-sponsored committee that has been examining concentration of economic power in Israel submitted its interim recommendations to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last week, almost a year after it was appointed.

Much of the report relates to the suggestion that several corporate holding companies that have interests in both the financial sector (such as banks, insurance companies and investment firms) and in other so-called real business enterprises, including communications companies and retailers, be given four years to end their interests in both sectors.

The committee proposed a relatively high threshold for the requirement to divest, meaning that it would only affect financial firms managing assets of more than 50 billion shekels and non-financial holdings in companies with sales of more than 8 billion shekels, or a corporate balance sheet of more than 20 billion shekels.

If the recommendations are finalized, they will affect Nochi Dankner, the controlling shareholder of the IDB group, Yitzhak Tshuva, who controls the Delek group, and Zadik Bino, who has non-financial interests that include the Paz Oil company as well as an ownership stake in the First International Bank of Israel.

IDB's holdings include non-financial interests in the Cellcom cellular firm, Super-Sol supermarkets and Nesher Cement, as well as a stake in the Clal Finance firm. Tshuva's Delek group controls a range of non-financial business interests in addition to Phoenix Insurance and the Excellence investment firm. Dankner and Tshuva would put their insurance companies up for sale, and Bino would have to choose whether to retain ownership of either Paz or First International Bank.

The economic concentration committee was also charged with coming up with recommendations vis-a-vis the pyramid-type corporate structure of many Israeli consortia that allows a controlling shareholder with a major stake at the top of the corporate pyramid to exert control lower down with a relatively small investment. On this score, however, the committee didn't propose any drastic changes.

The panel proposed allowing for the continued existence of these corporate pyramids, albeit subject to certain limitations, such as strengthening the influence of minority shareholders on issues such as executive compensation and major business decisions.

In the wake of the social protests that swept the country over the summer, the committee came under pressure to publish its recommendations. The committee will hold public hearings to discuss its findings.

The leaders of the social protest movement have convened their own panel of economic experts who said the committee's recommendations were too little and too late. They also expressed doubts that the recommendations would lead to increased competition to such an extent that it would lower the cost of living substantially.

EYE ON ARTS

By BILL GLADSTONE

SHOW FEATURES PAINTINGS BY THREE GENERATIONS OF A FAMILY

Paintings from three generations of artists – a grandfather, father and son – painted before, during and after World War II, are currently on display in a Toronto gallery.

Sole of a Shoe: Three Generations of Painting features paintings by Chaim Pinchas Podeszwa, Yidel Podeswa and Howard Podeswa rendered in Ivansk and Lodz (Poland), a German concentration camp, a refugee camp, and Toronto.

Some of the paintings are never-before-exhibited miniatures by Yidel Podeswa during and after the Holocaust, and others are works by Howard Podeswa based on a recent visit to Poland. (Another member of the talented Toronto-based Podeswa family is the renowned international film and television director Jeremy Podeswa.)

"It's a very moving, rich and unexpected exhibition," says curator Eric Woodley. At the Wynick/Tuck Gallery, 401 Richmond St. W., Suite 128, through Oct. 15. 416-504-8716, www.wynicktuckgallery.ca

Growing up in a mixed family was less tense than you might think, says the writer of the Broadway hit comedy My Mother's Italian, My Father's Jewish & I'm in Therapy, now playing at Toronto's Bathurst St. Theatre.

"It was a loving family. There was no tension," says Steve Solomon.

But he follows that up with a joke: "My mother and father would argue sometimes about religion. It got so bad, my father started looking at his burial spot as his vacation getaway."

When Solomon grew up in the half-Italian/half-Jewish neighbourhood of Sheepshead Bay in Brooklyn, N.Y., intermarriage was rare. He went to Hebrew school and had a bar mitzvah, but also went to church to pick up his Grandma Angelina. He says the advantage was, between the Italian holidays and the Jewish holidays, he never had to go to school.

"There is so much Jewish irony and comedy, they blend together," says Solomon. "My father's family [who are from Russia] were always laughing and playing around. My uncles and cousins, who on the outside were tough Italian guys, were soft, mushy and cushy on the inside. It was really good for me because I played both ends to get in the middle, all the time."

Although the one-man show is based on his own life, Solomon says, it's not just about his family. "It's about the cops that stop you on the street, the doctors you go to, the craziness at the airport… you relate to that and that is what makes the show work."

Polish filmmaker directs her third Holocaust film

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Celebrated Polish filmmaker Agnieszka Holland describes her latest film, In Darkness, as "a journey into the darkest recesses of the human soul."

A Canadian, German and Polish co-production based on a true story set in Nazi-occupied Poland, the film revolves around a Catholic sewer worker who sustains a small group of Jews hiding in the rat-infested sewers of Lvov by providing them with food and water over a 14-month period.

The worker, an antisemite, helps the Jews for monetary gain, but eventually he forms a proprietorial relationship with them and becomes a better, even heroic, person.

Screened at this year's Toronto International Film Festival, In Darkness is Holland's third movie about the Holocaust in 26 years. Angry Harvest was an Academy Award nominee for best foreign film in 1985. Five years later, Europa, Europa was nominated for an Oscar in the best screenplay category.

In an interview, Holland – a Polish and French national who divides her time between Los Angeles, Paris and Warsaw but calls herself "a citizen of the world" –said that In Darkness is closer to Angry Harvest in terms of tone but less "epochal" than Europa, Europa.

She was frankly wary about directing yet another film on the Holocaust. "I said no when they sent me the script, but they were stubborn and kept coming back."

Holocaust fatigue notwithstanding, Holland objected to the fact that In Darkness – based on Robert Marshall's book In the Sewers of Lvov – would be in English and therefore, in her mind, inauthentic. "If I had to touch the topic again, I wanted the film to be in Polish," she explained. Once the producers agreed to her demand, Holland came on board.

True to her vision, In Darkness – Poland's entry for the 2012 Academy Awards in the best foreign language category – unfolds not only in Polish, but in Ukrainian, Yiddish and German as well.

Bought by Sony Pictures Classics, In Darkness was made by Studio Filmowe Zebra of Poland in conjunction with Hidden Films of Canada and Schmidtz Filmkollektiv GmbH of Germany.

Rather than being filmed in Lvov – which has been known as Lviv since the advent of Ukraine's independence in 1991 – In Darkness was made in Germany and Poland. "It was impossible for financial reasons to shoot in Lvov," she noted, saying that Berlin, Leipzig and Lodz filled in for Lvov.

By any measure, Holland, who turns 63 on Nov. 28, was ideally suited to make this visceral and searing film.

Born in Warsaw, where her mother and daughter still live, Holland is of mixed Jewish-Catholic descent. Her father, Henryk, was a Polish Jew who escaped to the Soviet Union after Germany's invasion of Poland in 1939. A communist, he was a soldier in the Red Army during World War II.

After returning to Poland, he discovered that his parents had been murdered in the Warsaw ghetto. His sister, carrying papers identifying her as a Polish Christian, worked in Germany as a labourer during the war.

Holland's mother, Irena Rybczynska, was a member of the Polish underground and fought the Germans in the 1944 Warsaw uprising. In 1943, she saved a Jew, and many years later Yad Vashem recognized her as a righteous gentile.

Members of the Communist party in postwar Poland, Holland's parents were both journalists who edited official party newspapers. A revisionist who had grown disillusioned with communism, Henryk Holland was arrested in 1961, and committed suicide while being interrogated. After his untimely death, Holland's mother remarried. Her new husband was also Jewish. "My mother always believed that Jews are a noble part of humanity," she said.

Holland was raised in a secular home, but today she considers herself Jewish. As she put it, "I feel close to the Jewish destiny and I'm interested in Jewish culture."

Chuckling, she added, "I get the worst of both worlds. Orthodox Jews don't consider me a Jew and antisemites think I'm Jewish."

In 1968, when the Polish government launched an antisemitic campaign under the guise of anti-Zionism, Holland was studying film and TV in Prague.

Despite the events of 1968, Holland went back to Poland in 1971. "Out of stubbornness," she says. "I didn't want antisemites to determine where I would live." But Holland's aunt and her family emigrated, settling in Sweden.

Working with such luminaries as Andrzej Wajda and Krzysztof Zanussi, Holland's career in Poland flourished. Her first major film, Provincial Actors, an allegory on the political situation in Poland, won the International Critics Prize at the 1980 Cannes Film Festival.

Later, in the United States, she directed such films as Total Eclipse and The Secret Garden. In addition, she worked in television.

Holland left Poland just before martial law was declared at the end of 1981. "My life has been in different places since then," she said.

She was surprised by the fall of communism in Poland and its replacement by democracy. "I never expected it to happen so soon. It looked so hopeless."

Holland is pleased that contemporary Poland has begun to come to terms with its antisemitic past, that the young generation had generally displayed a keen interest in Poland's Jewish historical dimension and that a succession of Polish governments have supported Israel.

A scene from the Holocaust film In Darkness

But on a darker note, she thinks that antisemitic stereotypes are, lamentably, still common and that Poland needs to work hard on dispelling such myths.

She has considered making a film about her late father – a template of the idealistic but misguided Polish Jewish postwar communist – but has not mustered the strength to do so.

Two years ago, the Polish media reported that Holland intended to direct a biopic on Krystyna Skarbek (1908-1952), a legendary Pole of partial Jewish origin who worked as a British agent under the nom de guerre of Christine Granville in Nazi-occupied Poland and France during the war.

"I haven't raised the funds for the film, but I'm still interested."

MONTREAL MUSEUM OF FINE ARTS OPENS NEW PAVILION AND CONCERT HALL

The Montreal Museum of Fine Arts, which marked its 150th anniversary in 2010, celebrates two more milestones this month as it opens the new six-storey Claire and Marc Bourgie Pavilion of Quebec and Canadian Art attached to a historic 19th-century church, and inaugurates a new 444-seat concert hall that has been brilliantly retrofitted into the church's nave.

Housing some 600 works of art, the new exhibition hall adds a fourth pavilion to the museum's unique configuration of exhibition halls on both sides of Sherbrooke Street that are joined by an art-filled tunnel below the bustling boulevard.

The largest museum in Montreal and one of the top art institutions in Canada, the museum's history of expansion is an architectural affirmation of the Herzlian dictum (paraphrased), "Where there's a will, there's a way." Its home from 1912, a pillared, white-marble neoclassical structure called the Michal and Renata Hornstein Pavilion, was twice enlarged but ultimately proved far too small for the museum's huge art collection, only one-tenth of which, even today, can be shown at one time.

Hemmed in by surrounding buildings, the museum turned its attention across the street and handed the challenge of designing its second wing to renowned Israeli-Canadian architect Moshe Safdie. The result was the Jean-Noel Desmarais Pavilion, which opened to much fanfare and critical acclaim 20 years ago in 1991. Combining a white marble façade and the red-brick front of a century-old former apartment building, it also presented some delightful streetscapes through the vantage-point of several huge circular windows.

Those same oversize portholes now offer an excellent view of the new Bourgie Concert Hall and Pavilion, which has already begun to garner critical raves. Here in Toronto, we've learned that not all such institutional renovations are guaranteed to succeed. True, the Art Gallery of Ontario received overwhelming applause for its major transformation in 2008 at the hands of architect Frank Gehry. But the Royal Ontario Museum's angular Crystal, an addition designed by Daniel Libeskind, drew many pointed barbs after its opening in 2007; many continue to see it as heavy and oppressive.

Among the various exhibitions on view in the Jean-Noel Desmarais Pavilion is the remarkable assortment of artifacts on Napoleon that Ben Weider, the renowned Montreal bodybuilder, businessman and expert in Napoleonic history, gave to the museum on long-term loan shortly before he died in 2008.

Shalom and buongiorno

The former school superintendent, says that you don't have to be Jewish or Italian to love the show. "You just have to know what it is to go to a family dinner and come home with heartburn and a headache. And, remember why you left home in the first place.

"Everybody identifies with somebody in the show and that's what makes it work universally around the world. It did sold-out business in South Africa, what a shock? They expect to laugh... and they do," says Solomon, who has toured the show to more than 100 cities.

According to Solomon, the most significant similarity between Italians and Jews is they both love to hug and eat. "Jewish people always ask questions. My Italian family don't see nothin' or know anythin'. My Italian family pokes you when they're talking to you – they are very physical when they talk. My father once said when my Uncle Pauly had his hands in his pocket... OK, Uncle Pauly's mute today!"

It's not the first time the play has graced a Toronto stage. Before its almost two-year run on Broadway in 2006, Solomon performed his one-man show at Toronto's Winter Garden Theatre.

This time around, the show stars Tony Award winner Paul Kreppel, best known for his role as lounge lizard Sonny Mann in the '80s sitcom It's a Living. He has played this role for 18 months in New York City.

"I was the original star for many years, and as the company grew and the bookings came in, I had to get other people to do it," Solomon says. "It was a great thing, this little pimple of a show has become, according to Broadway World, one of the longest running one-man comedies in history.

"I am always updating it... probably a third of it has been rewritten with new material. It's a lot of fun."

Solomon has written two sequels that both tour throughout the United States: My Mother's Italian, My Father's Jewish & I'm STILL in Therapy and a holiday show that Solomon says has, surprisingly, become a blockbuster: My Mother's Italian, My Father's Jewish & I'm Home for the Holidays! There is interest in taking the latter to Winnipeg for the holiday season, although the South Florida native says that Winnipeg in the winter kind of scares him.

My Mother's Italian, My Father's Jewish & I'm in Therapy! runs from Oct. 12 to Jan. 1 at the Bathurst St. Theatre, 736 Bathurst St., Toronto. Tickets can be purchased through Ticketmaster at 1-855-985-ARTS (2787) or online at www.italianjewish.ca.

Poem of the month, poet for a nation

The U.S. Congress has appointed its new poet laureate, and it is a fine and inspiring choice: Philip Levine, now in his early 80s, but still one of the most readable, provocative and, in many ways, elegiac voices in American literary life.

The librarian of Congress, James Billington, called him "one of America's great narrative poets." His plainspoken lyricism has, for half a century, championed the art of telling "the simple truth" about working in a Detroit auto factory, as he has, and about the hard work we do to make sense of our lives. This could be said to describe a part of Levine's poetic burden, but this description might lead readers to mistakenly think of him as a latter-day Robert Frost or William Carlos William, both of whom held the laureate position in the 1950s.

Among the things that Billington neglects to highlight is Levine's strength as a poet of Jewish loss, who addresses Jewish emigration to the United States and work for the auto makers of Detroit in the shadow of immigrant heartbreak and the impact of World War II. Maybe it should come as no surprise that this is not what the librarian of Congress thought he should broadcast to the American populace, yet the absence of such information does both Levine and his prospective readers a disservice.

Reviewed by Norman Ravvin

Levine turns often in his work to family members, workmates and neighbours who rise up out of his Detroit childhood like figures in legend, their difficult lives and loves borne like the hard labour some of them did in factories and supply plants. But to treat Levine's poems with respect, it must be said that the people they describe rarely make sense of their lives, and his portrait of American economic and social life before mid-century is often dark and forbidding.

In his most recent collection, News of the World (Knopf, 2009), the wickedly funny Dearborn Suite opens this way:

> Middle-aged, supremely bored > with his wife, hating his work, > unable to sleep, he rises > from bed to pace his mansion > in slippers and robe, wondering > if this is all there ever > will be to becoming Henry Ford…

For those who work for "Henry, master of Dearborn" at the "great Rouge factory," there are no uplifting soliloquies. Rather

> Hell is here in the forge room > where the giant presses stamp > out body parts and the smell > of burning skin seeps into > our hair and under our nails.

One would expect the realities of Levine's poetic vision to make their way into public view, simply by increased sales of his books. Along with this will come recognition, among readers who did not know his work, of a lyricism deeply immersed in a sense of 20th-century Jewish history as a grim existential struggle. This comes to the fore in News of the World in My Fathers, The Baltic, which recalls Levine's grandfather, who > crossed

> 'this sea in'04
> and never returned…
> Yusel Prisckulnick,
> I bless your laughter > thrown in the wind's face, > your gall, your rages,
> your abiding love > for money and all
> it never bought, > for your cracked voice
> that wakens in dreams…

Which poet in Canada today could sound similar chords?

Canada does appoint a parliamentary poet laureate. A much younger program than that in the United States, its first appointed poet in 2002 was the Vancouver-based George Bowering. Since then three more have filled the post, seemingly with the goal of alternating between English- and French-language candidates. Canada's poet laureate is expected to write poetry, "especially for use in Parliament on important occasions," to sponsor poetry readings, advise the parliamentary librarian regarding the library's collection and acquisitions, "and to perform other duties at the request of the Speaker of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Commons or the parliamentary librarian."

Presently, the website for the parliamentary poet laureate lists no current holder of the position and adds the somewhat ominous promise that a "new call for nominations will be launched shortly."

One duty of the parliamentary poet laureate that has clear purpose is the choice of a "poem of the month," which appears with a biography of each chosen poet on the program's website. It's interesting to look at the list of chosen works to see which authors are familiar and how they vary from the established to the youthful. Among the choices of our four past parliamentary poet laureates there are none by Eli Mandel, who was, arguably, up to his death in 1992, the poet in our canon who might best be compared with Levine for his elegiac lyrics, his portrait of a little-know region of this country, and his powerful, often idiosyncratic depiction of Jewish loss.

Mandel's most haunting work appeared in the 1977 volume Out of Place, a travelogue in which the poet and his companion return to the southern Saskatchewan prairie where Mandel grew up and where his grandfather was a rabbi farmer at Hirsch. Parts of Out of Place are back in print as part of From Room to Room: The Poetry of Eli Mandel (Wilfrid Laurier University Press). If we were in a position to choose from it a "poem of the month," I'd be drawn to the musings on landscape and loss in near Hirsch a Jewish cemetery, which begins:

> while I stand in the uncut grass > counting the graves: there are forty
> I think > the Hebrew puzzles me
> the wind moving the grass
> over the still houses of the dead

Norman Ravvin's recent novel, The Joyful Child, will be presented in upcoming events at the Montreal Jewish Public Library, the Vancouver Jewish Book Festival and at Dalhousie University in Halifax.

Pospisil leads Canada to Davis Cup win in Israel

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

Vasek Pospisil of Vancouver became an overnight Canadian tennis star when he won two singles and one doubles match to lead Canada to a narrow 3-2 victory over Israel in their recent Davis Cup best of five matches tie in Ramat Hasharon, Israel.

Pospisil, only 21, showed remarkable poise, energy and determination in winning all three of Canada's matches. Ranked 124 in the world, Pospisil upset higher-ranked Dudi Sela (96th) 7-6 (4), 6-7 (6), 6-1, 6-7 (2), 6-3 over five hours in the 40-degree heat in the opening match.

The following day, Pospisil again played hero for Canada, partnering with Daniel Nestor of Toronto to upset the established Israeli doubles team of Jonathan Erlich and Andy Ram 4-6, 6-3, 6-4, 6-4. It marked the first time in six years that the Israeli duo lost a Davis Cup match on home soil.

Pospisil saved his best performance for the last match – defeating Amir Weintraub (ranked 178th) 6-2, 7-6 (3), 6-4, overpowering the Israeli with 27 aces to clinch the tie for Canada.

"I had a weekend I will never forget. It was thrilling to beat Sela, Weintraub and the Israeli doubles team on their turf. I was ready to fight to the last point. A lot of the energy I had is adrenaline," Pospisil said in a conference call following his tie-clinching victory, commenting on his 12 hours on court playing three matches in three days.

The victory sealed Canada's entry into the world group of 16 nations in 2012. The Israeli defeat means they will play in the regulation Europe/Asia zone next year.

Despite sub-par performances by Sela and Erlich/Ram, the bright spot for the Israelis was the emergence of 25-year-old Weintraub as Israel's next rising tennis star.

Weintraub upset the highly touted Milos Raonic of Thornhill (ranked 31st) 5-7, 7-5, 6-3, 6-1 for the best result of his career.

Raonic, sidelined since June with a hip injury and a case of food poisoning two days before playing, had to pull out of his remaining singles match after his loss.

"Today is my birthday and I had my best present ever by having the match of my life. I felt I would win the match after the first set. The win will build confidence for the rest of the year and I hope my rankings will rise," said Weintraub after his victory to tie the series 1-1.

Although Sela lost his opening match, he rebounded with a 6-3, 6-3, 6-3 thrashing of Peter Polansky of Thornhill, a substitute for Raonic, to tie the series at 2-2.

The tie was historic as both nations met for the first time in Davis Cup history. The matches produced drama, tension and a high quality of tennis that was thrilling for the 5,000 robust, partisan Israeli fans on site and millions more that watched live on television in Canada and Israel.

The tie marked the first time Canadians watched a sports event televised live from Israel on national TV (Rogers Sportsnet), seeing first hand the drama unfold at Canada Stadium.

Nobody in Canada could have been more pleased with the Canada-Israel Davis Cup tie than Joe Frieberg of Toronto. In 1977, Frieberg, as chair of the Israel Tennis Centers in Canada, raised more than $1 million from notable Canadian philanthropists to construct Canada Stadium, named in honor of the Canadian financiers.

"How happy I am to see the fruits of our efforts 34 years ago emerge when I saw the matches on television. I am so proud of what our donations for the Israel Tennis Centers has done, not only to support the talented Israeli pros, but giving millions of children in Israel an opportunity to learn and play tennis," Frieberg said.

"It is a proud moment for both nations, and I hope to see Canada play Israel again in Davis Cup tennis soon," he added.

Canada has played Israel in tennis only one other time, when the Israelis blanked Canada 3-0 in the women's Fed Cup tie held in Kamloops, B.C., in 1997.

TRAVEL TALK

By Bill Gladstone

A short perambulation via elevator, escalators and the art-lined subterranean walkway brings one to the museum's Hornstein Pavilion where the crowd-pleasing exhibit The Fashion World of Jean Paul Gaultier: From the Sidewalk to the Catwalk is on view until early October.

Even for fashion-challenged people such as myself, this exhibit manages to astonish for technological reasons. Clad in Gaultier's avant-garde designs, a row of apparently inert mannequins comes suddenly to life, each in turn at unpredictable moments: their eyes become animated, they smile, they talk, then revert to stillness once again. No, they are not actors, nor are we witnessing an advanced form of robotics, but rather the alarmingly lifelike projection of video special effects upon three-dimensional masks.

Strolling along this well-appointed stretch of Sherbrooke Street, one passes an assortment of some of the fine Victorian-era mansions that the city's wealthiest residents once called home. It is said that the millionaire businessmen and industrialists who once lived in Montreal's "Golden Square Mile" – the area between Sherbrooke Street and the mountain – controlled about 75 per cent of Canada's wealth.

Today, the richness extends to various local museums such as the McCord Museum (690 Sherbrooke St. West), where the Montreal Panorama, a monumental photographic collage of the city by Andre Cornellier, remains on view through Oct. 16. Mounted on a vast curved wall, this mosaic of some 1,300 individual photographs presents the city in both macrocosmic and microcosmic detail – one can see men loading boxes, women hanging clothes on clotheslines, children playing in parks – in an enormous pastiche that also magically includes all four seasons. That famous phrase, "Mon payee, c'est l'hiver," certainly applies to Montreal. Another photography exhibit – Edward Burtynsky: Oil – opens Oct. 6 and continues to Jan. 8, 2012.

A few blocks north of Sherbrooke, on the McGill University campus, is the old-fashioned Redpath Museum, the sleepy repository of an assortment of precious natural-history objects including dinosaur skeletons, geological samples, botanical specimens and stuffed animals, large and small. It's a good place to take the kids on a rainy afternoon – and, what's more, it's free.

For more information on visiting these museums or on planning a trip to Montreal, visit www.tourismemontreal.org.

McGill student runs for Liberal party policy chair

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

When he was just 13 years old, Zach Paikin volunteered on his first election campaign. Even though he was doing only the basic tasks a young volunteer might be asked to do, he remembers the experience fondly.

He went on to be one of the founding members and co-chairs of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) High School Working Group and dreamed that one day he would be able to make a real impact on Canada's political scene.

This January, his dream might become a reality if he succeeds in his campaign to become the Liberal Party of Canada policy chair.

Paikin, now 20, is a McGill student majoring in Middle East studies. He grew up in Toronto and attended a French immersion school, Lycee Francais de Toronto, where he became fluent in French. Ever since he was a young child, his father, Steve Paikin, anchor and senior editor of TVO's The Agenda with Steve Paikin, would take him to political events that he was covering.

Paikin soon realized he was very passionate about Canadian politics and decided on a party he could identify with.

After volunteering with the Conservatives, the Liberals, the New Democratic Party and the Green party, Paikin found the Liberal party matched his classical liberal economic views and his ideological views on the type of country Canada should be.

"It's hard to say at age 14 that you know where you want your country to go, but watching the Liberal party retreat from power gives you an indication of where you think it's possible to rebuild," said Paikin.

From a young age, he immersed himself in the world of Canadian politics. In high school, he helped co-found and lead CJPAC's High School Working Group, an initiative designed to engage high school students in the Canadian political process.

"We were brought out to political events and it allowed us to network in the field, to train and learn simple skills in the office. The people I worked with later went on to become CJPAC campus fellows across Canadian university campus and my good friends as well."

After watching the Liberal party suffer a huge defeat in the recent federal election, Paikin knew the party needed a change and that he wanted to be involved in that process.

"We need to fix the basic structure of the party. It's too bureaucratic, it's too difficult to get involved and they're not in touch with the grassroots at all. If we're going to rebuild and move forward from this defeat, the party needs to embrace serious change and younger people are more prepared to lead that change," said Paikin.

McGill student Zach Paikin hopes to become the next Liberal Party of Canada policy chair.

In January, riding associations across Canada will send delegates to Ottawa for a convention, where the voting for the executive roles will take place. Until then, Paikin will be campaigning to – as he sees it – save the Liberal Party of Canada.

"There's not enough room in Canada for two or three parties on the left so the Liberal party really needs to decide what it stands for and earn back the seats we lost," said Paikin.

He hopes more young people get involved in the party as well. In addition to his political involvement on campus, Paikin also sits on the board of directors of the Mount Royal Liberal Association in Quebec and is a political columnist for the student newspaper the Prince Arthur Herald.

"I'm ready to move up, to create a national policy change. My age is not a limitation but an advantage. The executives of the Liberal party should be made up of people in their 20s and 30s, not 50s and 60s," said Paikin.

Keith Torrie, national director of the Liberal Party of Canada, agrees it's vital young people get involved.

"Our engagement ensures our values are represented in the decision-making process. We don't want to inherit a society in which we don't see our values," said Torrie. He points out that it was the young Liberals who pushed Paul Martin to make same-sex marriage legal in Canada.

"The Young Liberals of Canada mandate is to engage young Canadians in the Liberal party to help ensure the party reflects the values of young progressive, compassionate Canadians. With that mandate we have come halfway to helping shape politics by influencing a political party to choose leaders and policies that are youth friendly," Torrie said. By running this campaign, Paikin hopes to do just that.

In the coming months, Paikin is campaigning to get himself taken seriously by the older, more experienced members of his party and prove that the change he wants to bring is necessary to the party's rebirth.

"It's not easy running this campaign, but adversity keeps me going, and it makes me more convinced of my own beliefs because I know I need to provide an alternative perspective," said Paikin. "That's what keeps me motivated."

For more information about Paikin, visit www.votepaikin.ca.

"הקוראים שלי רוצים לדעת עוד פרטים עליך." אני מודיעה לטלי, אשר זוקרת לעברי אצבע מחודדת. "שלא תעזי להסגיר עלי פרטים מזהים" היא מזהירה "מספיק כבר שכתבת שאני שמחה שאמא שלי לא גרה בקנדה."

טלי: והקטע הוא, שאנחנו מנסים בפתולוגיה מעוררת רחמים ליצור לנו משפחה חלופית. קחי אותי לדוגמה, מחר אני מתארחת אצל...עזבי...אני מבולבלת...

אני: ואפרופו, אל תכיני שום אוכל למחר. מתנה מהודרת מחנות יוקרה, זה כל מה שאני מבקשת לארוחת החג. ועם פתק החלפה בבקשה.

טלי: בהחלט. אל תשכחי שאחותי גרה כאן ומעבירה לאמא הכל.

אני: יופי, תזכירי לי שיש לך אחות פה. אני תיכף מתה מקיטאה. אגב, היא מביאה אלינו את החבר החדש שלה לארוחה?

ROSH HASHANAH
APPLE-WALNUT SALAD

- 3/4 c walnut or pecan halves, toasted
- 4 crisp apples, i.e. McIntosh
- Juice of 1 lemon
- 1 c finely diced celery
- 1/2 c diced red bell pepper
- 3/4 c sour cream
- 1 tbsp. Dijon mustard
- 1 1/2 tbls. honey
- 1 tsp. minced fresh mint
- salt and freshly ground pepper, to taste
- 1 or 2 heads Boston lettuce

To Toast Nuts - Preheat oven to 200°F. Spread nuts on baking sheet; bake until lightly toasted, 6 -7 min. Coarsely chop; set aside.
Peel, quarter, core apples, cut into 1/2" slices. In bowl, toss apples with lemon juice. Add celery, bell pepper, nuts; stir to combine. In another bowl, combine sour cream, mustard, honey, mint. Whisk until well blended, season with salt and pepper.
Arrange lettuce leaves around rim of serving platter. Add dressing to apple mixture; mix well. Spoon salad onto center of plate.

Is Canada on the verge of larger immigration from Israel?

Caloric holidays

We are bloated. Fat.

Our community has eaten large portions of provisions and indulged, in some ways, beyond repair. The humility Judaism demands of us is at the bottom of the bowl, covered by heaping spoonfuls of entitlement. It has gotten so that it's hard for those we honour to wiggle out of their trousers.

We are large, rolling about in our heaps of gold coins and nuggets, staging protests against our enemies indoors and erecting edifices with insufficient rooms and cabinets for soul and spirit.

What has our search for meaning become? Find me an investment and I will contribute millions toward the new cloakroom, rabbi. Let me slip a note into the Wailing Wall asking God for affluence.

While our successes are grand, while Israel is white and sticky, our character is hoity-toity and our children blind to the needy.

It's Rosh Hashanah, the High Holidays, and the children barely know how to ask. We act as if we are the clay and the potter. Quietly, and ever so carefully, leaders on the buses will tell you about the teenagers who travel to Israel filled with thoughts of riches and material treasurers. Fearful of upsetting the donor or the rich woman whose name shines so sparkly on walls everywhere, that same person will express his or her disappointment at our parenting and leadership.

Avrum Rosensweig

We are the children, and our prayers will be light and uneventful, and, unless Gilad Schalit is mentioned, we won't consider his jail. Unless modern-day slavery is the clergy's topic, it will go unnoticed. Unless antisemitism is brought up from the pulpit, we'll be fine. We'll be fine. We'll be well fed.

Oh, portly fellow Jews, our wealth fools us, like the sarcophagus did the Pharaoh, who believed that as long as his jewels were by his side, in life or death, he was safe.

We have become a panjandrum, a self-important person. We are pugnacious. But we have virtues, hearty ones, and in vast amounts. We have sitzfleisch (the ability to sit still and focus) while awaiting the future, regardless of our awareness of our past. Sometimes, however, they (our virtues) appear as if they're a shadow standing alone, disconnected from its root.

Where have we gone, my Jewish family? What has Holocaust education taught us? Why is our soul so very green in colour and so downy in texture?

It's the new year, and a revolution is required, one that reminds us we are the Chosen People whose job it is to be a "light unto the nations." It's the High Holidays, and we must remind ourselves that the brisket is not the reason for our celebration. We must instead baste ourselves in learning and awe. And we must not allow our hedge funds to grow so high that they will be fences and walls between us, when the naked girl standing immobile in the streets of Mumbai is begging for love.

We are so very, very blessed to have so many millions. Imagine this Tishrei how creatively and wisely we might spend it to bring the Messiah. Imagine what potential we have within our fat wealth to bring peace to the Jewish people, and this earth, so creatively sculpted by God.

Shanah Tovah. Happy New Year. How can we not be critical of ourselves?

Why history matters

'It is important to note that the last time the question of Palestinian statehood took center stage at the General Assembly, the question posed to the international community was whether our homeland should be partitioned into two states. In November 1947, the General Assembly made its recommendation and answered in the affirmative. Shortly thereafter, Zionist forces expelled Palestinian Arabs to ensure a decisive Jewish majority in the future state of Israel, and Arab armies intervened. War and further expulsions ensued.'

Excerpted from "The long overdue Palestinian state" by Mahmoud Abbas, New York Times, May 16, 2011.

Editorial

Seldom has one man so dominated the news as this man, Palestinian Authority and PLO leader Mahmoud Abbas, has in the past few weeks. He wears the mantle, if not quite also the keffiyah, of his predecessor Yasser Arafat, the faux revolutionary who abhorred the thought of bringing his people sovereign independence peacefully, through negotiations, without the spilling of blood – both that of his own people as well as that of the Jews.

Unlike Arafat, Abbas is mostly clean-shaven and wears business suits instead of the dramatically tailored olive-green military jacket. Nor is Abbas as overtly inclined to violence as Arafat was.

But very much like his predecessor, he shares the same aversion to truth. Indeed, based upon the historical record, it appears that truth hardly matters to him at all.

The text highlighted on this page is excerpted from an op-ed essay Abbas wrote for the New York Times published on May 16, 2011. The essay was intended to prepare the political, intellectual and emotional soil, so to speak, for his plan to have the United Nations recognize an independent, sovereign state of Palestine,

We must set the record straight

a more sophisticated, nuanced gambit than his predecessor would have devised, to yet again avoid negotiating a mutually satisfactory or mutually distasteful peace treaty with Israel and an end, finally, to the conflict.

Anyone familiar with the history of the events of which Abbas has written, namely the decision by the UN General Assembly to partition Mandatory Palestine into Arab and Jewish states, will immediately see that the highlighted text is a wholesale distortion of truth and fact. Prof. Shlomo Avineri, one of the essayists in the pages of this Rosh Hashanah supplement describes Abbas' op-ed as "shameful and mendacious."

And yet, the Palestinian leaders' propensity for prevarication, for the distortion of history, the mangling of truth, the utter disregard of honesty seems to bring very little censure upon them in international discourse, even in circles where one would hope that truth and history would matter.

But if Abbas' dissembling matters little to others, it matters a great deal to us.

That is why this supplement deals with the importance and sanctity of truth. It attempts to demonstrate why, in humanity's eternal, imperative march toward a better society, history matters.

We have therefore assembled a panel of distinguished scholars and thinkers who provide information, facts, analysis and opinion regarding Israel's conflict with the Palestinians, starting with the event that Abbas has so deliberately mischaracterized – the partition vote of Nov. 29, 1947.

Each essayist is uniquely expert and qualified in his or her subject.

Barry Rubin has written the cover essay of the supplement. He explains why history matters in the struggle to combat the alarming phenomenon of increasing anti-semitism and its conjoining with anti-Israelism.

Shlomo Avineri reflects upon the roots of the conflict as a function of the undiminished Arab rejectionism since before 1948 of the idea of a Jewish state alongside.

Anita Shapira writes about the fateful days surrounding the founding of the State of Israel.

Yehoshua Freundlich separates the myths from the reality regarding the vote for partition on Nov. 29, 1947.

Yaffa Zilbershats comprehensively discusses the question of whether international law allows or confers a right of return for Palestinian refugees.

Ed Morgan reminds readers of the forgotten formula for peace-making between the parties that was enshrined in UN Security Council Resolution 242.

Irwin Cotler decisively exposes the insidious international campaign to disguise or "launder" the delegitimization of the Jewish state.

Sir Martin Gilbert writes of a little-known episode in the early 20th century regarding the Jews' arrival to the region involving both Winston Churchill and T.E. Lawrence (of Arabia).

Gary Rosenblatt offers a pragmatic prescription for helping to equip upcoming younger generations to respond to the distorters of Zionist history.

And finally, Paul Michaels, the director of research and media relations with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), has provided a short timeline of the history of the peace process in the Middle East from 1947 to 2010. Indeed Michaels was instrumental in lining up the essayists for this supplement. His assistance in preparing the supplement was invaluable to the entire project.

With this supplement, we attempt to respond to Abbas' false statements in the New York Times essay and to the many other impersonations of truth he and his colleagues have authored. We set the record straight, at least for the sake of the younger generations who are, alas, mostly unaware of the epoch-making events surrounding the founding of Israel, except if at all, through the stories of their parents and grandparents or the history that they themselves have sought to learn.

We also set the record straight for its own sake, for the sheer correctness of doing so, of protecting the truth of the past from those maliciously intent on altering the past.

That is why history matters. Not just for the supporters of the Jewish state but for people who understand that ceding the past to the falsifier, cedes also the future.

We will never willingly allow that.

There is so much for our children to know. There is much more still for us to teach them. It is vital that we do so.

Our hope is that this supplement will provide a convenient and worthy beginning point to do so.

Why history matters

Jews become very nervous when people start lying about history, especially Jewish history. And with good reason. No group in history has been the subject of more lies than the Jewish people. And what begins with the falsification of history has repeatedly led to hatred, slander, persecution and murder.

Historical precedent has thus taught Jews that how past events and motives are seen is important, often a matter of life and death. Neighbours' image of Jews can determine their future, even survival. Winston Churchill remarked that a lie travels halfway around the world before the truth can get its pants on. To this, Jewish experience adds that unreasoning hatred and irrational perceptions of reality may defy the truth and sweep all before them.

For centuries, we have repeatedly seen the same pattern, albeit with superficial variations. The beliefs and actions of Jews are distorted in absurd ways, double standards and fantasies applied to them, and the resulting misinformation is used to condemn Jews and to campaign against their interests.

At a time when Jews formed a coherent, largely self-governing traditional community that lived within its own institutions, they universally understood this process. More than a century ago, the Jewish and Zionist essayist Ahad Ha-Am, wrote: How do we know that our enemies are lying and that we are telling the truth? Because, he said, we know that we don't kill little children and grind them up to use their blood to make Passover matzot.

Barry Rubin

While there are still stories in the Muslim-majority world about Jews turning kids into matzah, the more sophisticated have updated the tale with the high-tech claim that Jews kill people and steal their organs. A few months ago, that blood libel appeared prominently in the largest circulated Swedish newspaper, and at the very moment I write these words a Palestinian Authority cabinet minister said the same thing.

There also remain devotees of the more traditional versions of anti-Semitic stories. Suha Arafat once told visiting First Lady Hillary Clinton that the Jews poisoned West Bank wells. Arabic-language newspapers claimed that the Zionists distribute poisoned foods. From Morocco through Pakistan, millions believe that September 11 was a Jewish Zionist plot. Such slanders might be taken as jokes, but they shape the attitudes of people and the policies of nations. People, often Jews, die as a result.

Old tales and conspiracy theories of this type usually have less traction in the West. This kind of thing is easier to ridicule in Western circles, but there are a lot of other rewritings of history that come complete with footnotes and are more acceptable to Westerners. Indeed, it is reasonable to note that the majority of what is taught about Israel, Zionism, and the Arab-Israeli conflict in top universities today is the academic equivalent of the historic distortions of history about Jews along religious or racialist lines. Lying about the Jewish people and hating them has now become chic in some elite European circles.

In this regard we are in a situation remarkably similar to what Theodor Herzl, the founder of modern political Zionism, discovered in the 1890s. Herzl wrote that despite advances in technology, transportation, and communication, one thing remained as it was when the Turks conquered Byzantium, Columbus set sail, and oxcarts were the main means of travel. That one thing was antisemitism. "After a short breathing space," Herzl mournfully wrote, "bad times have come again...not only in the backward countries...but also in those that are called civilized."

Remember, that for Herzl's audience — decades before the Holocaust — the return of antisemitism was as startling as it is for us today. They thought that democratic ideas, scientific advances, and new technology — railroads, steamships, the telegraph — had brought a new, brighter age in which antisemitism would be made extinct by education and democracy. Yet, substitute Internet for telegraph; jet planes for railroads; or landing on the moon for global exploration and Herzl's warning is as accurate for us as it was in the late nineteenth century.

What Herzl called the end of the "short breathing space" parallels the interim few decades of revulsion at the massacre of one-third of the world's Jews in the Holocaust. What was thought to be the attainment of permanent sanity on "the Jewish Question" proved only a temporary remission.

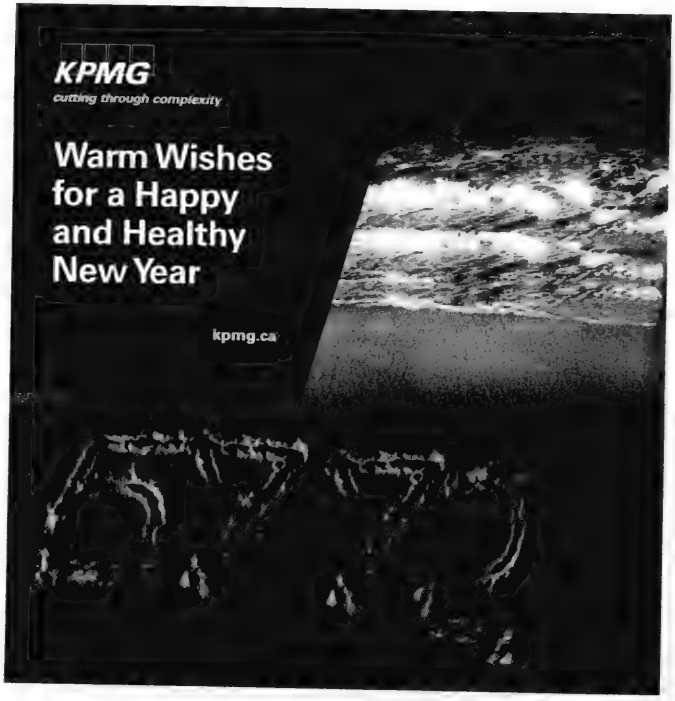
In my book, Assimilation and Its Discontents, published in 1985, I noted that antisemitism at that time was about the lowest it had been in two millennia. A decade later, the writer Hillel Halkin remarked that we all thought that (about the level of antisemitism) at the time but who could say that now?

Even Herzl's distinction between "backward countries" what the less developed countries were called then - and "those that are called civilized," which relates to the modern-day West, perfectly matches our contemporary world. In the former, a more traditional type of antisemitism and distortion of history prevail; in the West, antisemitism is more likely to be disguised as anti-Zionism and rewriting history given a scholarly patina. Thus, Princeton University Press, considered to be the most serious scholarly of them all, has published a book by a hater of Israel who asserts that Zionism is a criminal mental illness.



An anti-Israel demonstration in Paris in 2003

In France, the Muhammad Dura affair is the Dreyfus affair of our time. Whereas a Jewish officer once deemed a traitor on forged evidence drew massive support from French intellectuals, their contemporary equivalents lionize the journalist who falsely accused Israel of murdering a Palestinian child in cold blood. Even a French court ruling that the television report was false has had no effect on their attitude.

Consider the respected New York Times, which ran an op-ed piece by a radical Islamist whose grandfather was the head of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood. He was allowed to claim that the Brotherhood was an anti-Nazi, pro-democratic group when every historian knows this to be a lie. Indeed, I have copies of the receipts given to the Germans along with detailed discussions of the Brotherhood's plans to wipe out Egypt's Jews if the Afrika Korps advanced to Cairo.

Or look at the daily generation of new lies about Israel in mainstream wire services, newspapers, and television stations. Bias that would have led to the instant firing of journalists, editors, and photographers a couple of decades ago now bring no such punishment, while repeated exposure does not change their behaviour. Even when misstatements are disproven, the corrections rarely catch up with the original falsehoods.

Here's one of many examples. The Los Angeles Times ran an article bemoaning the horrible sufferings among the people in Gaza due to an Israeli cut of the electricity in the Gaza Strip. When it was pointed out to the paper that there had not yet been a stoppage, although it was planned due to the fact that the Hamas government had simply stopped paying its bills for the delivery of electricity, it took three weeks of concentrated effort to get a small correction inserted. It was pointed out to the paper that the dramatic photos of a darkened meeting of the Palestinian-Gaza parliament had been achieved by someone simply turning off the lights in the chamber and closing the shutters to prevent the entry of the sunlight that would have otherwise illuminated the room because of the daylight outside.

The main Australian television network has interviewed me, then edited the footage so while I was actually saying that Hamas didn't want peace, the program appeared to have me saying that Israel didn't want peace. Oh dear, the network responded to my protest, it obviously was a technical error.

Why go on? The distortion of history to make Israel seem the aggressor that wants no peace and the airbrushing out of facts that are proportionately equivalent to the Canadian Rockies is quite deliberate and unrelenting. In both academia and media we see the systematic destruction of professional ethics, fairness, and balance.

How has this happened? In large part, it has taken place through the distortion of history, by lies easily disproven through evidence and documentation. A striking feature of this process is that these lies about history are so fragile and so easily disproven that they require intimidation by a near-monopoly structure that tries to prevent contrary views from being expressed. Only one version of reality is usually permitted because universities, newspapers, and television have all too often been transformed into means of propaganda and political indoctrination in a way that no one would have believed a few decades ago.

And while Israel and the Jews are far from the only target they are the most persistent and thoroughly distorted one. Distortions of history once applied to demonize the children of Israel are now used to demonize the citizens of Israel and the great majority of all Jews who support them.

Camouflaging antisemitism as something else, most usually as anti-Zionism today, is hardly a new idea. Equally, the use of individual Jews as the eager purveyors of these distortions is also an old story.

When antisemitism focused on religious hatred, Jews could usually escape by converting to Christianity or Islam, after which they could join in slandering their former co-religionists. The idea that the Talmud was a document designed to teach hatred of Christians was invented by such people.

The baptized son of Jewish parents, Karl Marx, expressed his hatred of Judaism, which he equated with greed, while Jewish Communists like Rosa Luxemburg and Lev Davidovitch Bronstein (aka Trotsky) sought to wipe out Jewish peoplehood. After taking power in Russia, Jewish communists banned Jewish religious practice, Yiddish, and all communal institutions.

Even in modern, pre-Holocaust Western Europe Jews could make themselves immune from antisemitism by separating themselves from Jewish religious observance and peoplehood.

Here is the great scholar of Byzantium, Gustave Schlumberger, writing of his old friend Charles Haas, the model for Marcel Proust's famous character, Swann:

"The delightful Charles Haas, the most likeable and glittering socialite, the best of friends, had nothing Jewish about him except his origins and was not afflicted, as far as I know, with any of the faults of his race..."

Thus, Schlumberger could protest that he had nothing to do with antisemitism in precisely the same manner as the haters and slanderers of Israel today. He didn't hate Jews as a whole, only the vast majority of Jews who insisted on being faithful to Jewish aspirations, identity, and history. Of course, today, since about 40 per cent of the world's Jews live in Israel and about 80 per cent of the remainder support Israel, someone who wants to destroy Israel is seeking to kill 40 per cent of the world's Jews and kill the hopes of most of the rest.

There are a number of elements involved in the rewriting of history that confuse the understanding of the issue.

First, there is the use of Nazi racialist antisemitism as the norm in considering how Jews and their history have been rewritten. In fact, in its universal condemnation of the very existence of Jews as human beings along side the impossibility of Jews doing anything to avoid extinction, this form of racism was exceptional. Usually, Jews were condemned for specific actions: being too cosmopolitan, too modernist, too religious, too leftist, and so on, as they are in the contemporary version of historical distortion. By viewing Nazism as the basic model for antisemitism, anything less is redefined as not meriting that label.

Second, in the same vein, the demonization of Jews is identified exclusively with the political right. Today, we ignore the fact that the main sources of antisemitism and lies about Israel's history are the Western left and Islamist or Muslim sources. One would think that the only problem Jews face comes from neo-Nazi skinheads. Failing to accurately ascribe the origin of demonization and falsehood is, in itself, a rewriting of history that makes it impossible to understand the situation, much less do anything about it.

Third, there is an attempt to propagate lies about the Jews as "acceptable" anti-Zionism rather than part of a broader campaign of demonization that parallels antisemitism. When I did a detailed study of PLO anti-Israel propaganda, I consistently found the same pattern.

Traditional antisemitic themes were exploited by changing the word "Jew" to "Zionist." For example, instead of saying that Jews dominated the world media and sought world conquest, it was claimed that Zionists were doing so. We also see Jews (Zionists or Israelis) described as supervillains capable of any, totally bloodthirsty and evil behavior.

Fourth, Jewish history has been systematically distorted, including the denial of the historic connection with the land of Israel; the claim that the Temple never existed in Jerusalem (an argument even used by Yasir Arafat on President Bill Clinton at the 2000 Camp David summit); the idea that Jews were always outsiders to the majority cultures among whom they lived rather than insiders in their own distinct community, and so on.

Fifth, the creation of an entire industry of distorting history including the manufacture of false atrocities and distortions purveyed at UN committees, academic conferences, and the mass media. A notorious example of this was the publication of the Goldstone Report in which UN commissioners, some of whom were known to be hostile to Israel, took testimony from Hamas and other anti-Israel sources in the Gaza Strip then reported, without challenge, claims that were often undocumented, contradictory, and even quite fantastic.

We are not the monsters of other's imaginations

Sixth, there has been a simple but remarkable transformation that is very poorly understood. The old version of historical distortion was to insist that Jews were inferior, evil, and should be discriminated against or even wiped out. The new version asserts that Jews (or Zionists or Israelis) say that others are inferior and want to wipe them out. Thus, there has been a transition from a right wing based antisemitism to a left wing and 'Third Worldist' version of history.

Jews, or at least the pro-Israel and Israeli majority, are portrayed as imperialistic and racist, thus giving an opportunity for "enlightened" Jews to appear virtuous by supporting the absurd claims of Israel's enemies.

Finally, there is the thorough distortion of Israeli history in terms of its broad themes and specific detail.

For example, in broad terms, the history of Israel's independence is changed from a defensive struggle for survival to an aggressive ethnic cleansing operation. The history of peace efforts becomes changed from an Israeli search for a compromise peace in the face of Arab rejectionism into the exact opposite.

To cite only one example of the distortion of the details of Israel's history, it has been the Palestinian Authority that has refused to negotiate seriously with Israel since December 2008 and yet the media continually reports the precise opposite to be true. How can all of these problem elements be dealt with? The answer is only by maintaining scholarly standards, using factual evidence and honest argument, and demanding that institutions live up to the norms in a democracy of professional ethics. It requires that young Jews obtain an alternative education in what the media and schools generally do not provide. There must be a determination on the part of individuals not to yield to intimidation or to careerist temptations in which one's birthright is sold out for a mess of potage.

And finally it requires a sense of pride and self-confidence, of knowing who we are in the manner suggested by Ahad Ha-Am: What matters is not how many lies are told about us but the truth of our knowledge that we are not the monsters of other's imaginations.

On the roots of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict

Like all conflicts between national movements, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is multi-layered and of course, has regional dimensions due to the support neighboring Arab countries and the Arab League have given over decades to their Palestinian brethren. Yet it is relatively easy to identify a defining moment in the history of both Zionism and Palestinian Arab nationalism, which is emblematic of the nature of the conflict and its evolution. That the Arab side has consistently avoided addressing it and its moral consequences further adds to the obstacles on the road to an eventual reconciliation between Israelis and Palestinians.

After World War II, Britain returned its League of Nations Mandate on Palestine to the United Nations, and after sending a commission of enquiry to the country and a series of debates, the UN General Assembly recommended on November 29, 1947 to partition the territory of British Palestine into two states: a Jewish and an Arab one. By this decision it granted international legitimacy to the claims of both Jewish nationalism – Zionism – and the Palestinian Arab people to self-determination and sovereignty, each in its respective nation-state.

Shlomo Avineri

The UN recognized that both nations have a claim to a place in the sun and viewed a two-state solution as the only just and fair answer to the conflicting claims of both national movements. In this the UN followed in the steps of the British Peel Commission, which was the first to suggest in 1937 the idea of partition as the only way out of the conundrum of the conflicting claims of the two national movements.

After the partition of British India in 1947 into two independent states and the establishment of Pakistan as the homeland for the Muslim minority in British India, the idea of partition, despite its obvious drawbacks, gained acceptance as a reasonable solution in similar situations in which minorities should not be subjected to sheer majority rule.

It is the different ways in which the Jewish and Arab communities responded to the partition plan that determined the history of the region.

Since each national movement initially claimed the whole country as its homeland, the idea of partition was not easy for either of them to accept. But after lengthy discussions, the Jewish community – and the Zionist movement – accepted partition as the only achievable aim, basing its decision on a variety of considerations. For one, since its own claim for a Jewish nation-state was founded on the principle of self-determination and since this principle is a universal tenet, hence one cannot deny to the other what one claims for oneself. Secondly, with the Arabs being then a majority in British Palestine, it was clear that it would be impossible to gain international support and legitimacy to a claim for the whole of Eretz Israel, as this would submit the Arab majority to the rule of the Jewish minority.

Out of such considerations, combining both principle and prudence, the Jewish community not only accepted the UN resolution but also saw it as an achievement of historical significance by granting universal legitimacy to the Jewish yearning to be a free people in its own land, as expressed in the Zionist anthem Hatikva.

Palestine could have happened May 15, 1948

The Palestinian Arab response, on the other hand, supported by the countries of the Arab League, was one of total rejection, refusing to accept any legitimacy to the Jewish claim to national self-determination. Consequently, the Palestinians and subsequently the neighbouring Arab states, went to war against the nascent Jewish state. They lost. The consequences were that hundreds of thousands of Palestinians lost their homes and became refugees, while the remaining Arab regions of the country – the West Bank and Gaza – rather than becoming the Palestinian Arab independent country, as envisaged by the UN, came, respectively, under Jordanian and Egyptian rule. Had the Palestinian Arabs accepted partition, an independent Palestine, living side by side with Israel, would have emerged on May 15, 1948 with the termination of the British Mandate. Herein lie the roots of the Palestinian tragedy, their statelessness and the refugee problem.

PALESTINEHOUSE.COM

Nakba is marked by Palestinians and their supporters around the world.

It is this historical crossroad that the Palestinians refuse to countenance and address to this very day. By calling their 1948 defeat and tragedy Nakba, they present it as if it were a natural disaster, totally devoid of human agency – and thus too of their responsibility. It is as if the official German narrative about World War II would have been today focusing on the expulsion of more than 12 million ethnic Germans from Poland, Czechoslovakia and other Eastern European countries after 1945, without ever mentioning that it was Nazi Germany which forcefully dismembered Czechoslovakia in 1938 and then attacked Poland on September 1, 1939 thus starting World War II. This does not necessarily mean that the Germans did not have some reasonable claims: but it was they who decided to resort to arms and warfare.

The same applies to the Palestinians and the neighboring Arab countries: one can well understand their unhappiness with the UN partition plan (so were also some Jews, especially since Jerusalem was excluded from the future Jewish state) – but it was the Palestinians who resorted to violence and chose war. Such decisions have consequences. No one in Europe today – not even in Germany – is willing to consider the idea that these German expellees and their descendants have any claim to return to the regions from which have been forcibly expelled and in which they and their ancestors had been living for centuries.

This unwillingness and inability to confront their own responsibility for their tragedy in 1948 has recently been exhibited in a disconcerting way by the shameful and mendacious oped by Mahmoud Abbas, the President on the Palestinian Authority, in the New York Times. In a piece ostensibly calling for reconciliation with Israel, the only mention of the UN is to maintain that the UN 'decided to partition my country" – clearly implying the continuing Palestinian claim for the whole country. There is not even a scintilla of a hint that the Palestinians rejected the UN decision and went to war against it. On the basis of such lies and avoidance of responsibility, it is difficult to build a historical reconciliation between the two nations, especially as such a twisted narrative continues to be the basis of how history is taught in Palestinian schools.

That this is not just a theoretical matter best relegated to quarrels among historians has recently also been in evidence in the Palestinian leadership's violent response to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's suggestion that as part of a future peace agreement between both sides, the Palestinians should recognize Israel as a Jewish nationstate.

There can be serious questions whether raising such a demand at this juncture is either necessary or recommended: it certainly makes achieving an agreement even more difficult.

Pre-1967 Israel would lose its Jewish majority

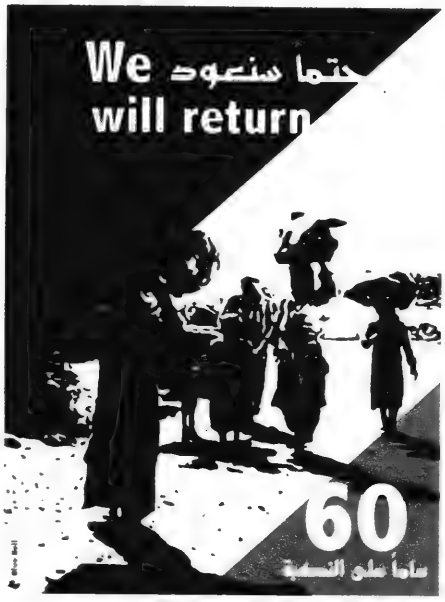
But the savage Palestine rejection of this demand speaks volumes, as it suggests once again that on the basic issue at stake – the legitimacy of both present Israel and future Palestine as the nation-states of their respective peoples - the Palestinians are still not reconciled to the acceptance of the claim for a Jewish nation-state. Many Israelis who were unhappy, and even critical when Netanyahu raised the issue, were taken aback by the total Palestinian rejection for it is evidence of a serious Palestinian rejection of the idea of Jewish sovereignty.

Part of the Palestinian rejectionist response has to do with a wider view current in the Arab consciousness that the Jews are not a nation, but merely a religious community. Part of it has to do with the hegemonic Arab national discourse, which views only the Arabs as legitimate claimants for national self-determination in the region which, significantly, is called in Arab parlance "the Arab region" and in which only the Arabs are entitled to be the bearers of sovereignty and political power. Hence Kurds, Maronites, Copts, Berbers (and Jews) are bereft of this entitlement. This is not exactly a modern version of being dhimmis (which is after all a religious, not a national category), but may be viewed as a secular echo of it. Again, a German analogy is in place: so long as the dominant German narrative viewed only the German Volk as being Staatsfähig, i.e. entitled to political power, there was no chance for peace in Europe.

Underlying the continued Palestinian claim for the 1948 refugees and their descendants to a right of return, there may be a further nationalist hope, sometimes explicitly stated, sometimes just implicitly lurking in the background. An Israel pushed to its pre-1967 borders, and burdened with significant numbers of returning Palestinian refugees, will lose its Jewish majority over time. Eventually Israel would turn out into another version of Lebanon, bereft of a distinct national identity based on a discrete, non-Arab, conception of its own nationhood.



Palestinians hope to displace the Jews who live in Israel.

Such an idea was once even raised by Boutros Boutros Ghali when he advocated his support for peace with Israel: not in order to accept its existence, but to diminish it. These are serious issues.

Do they mean that Israel bears no responsibility for the present stalemate in negotiations? Or that all its policies and moves are justified? By no means.

There is no doubt, historical claims and strategic considerations notwithstanding, that the existence of almost 300,000 Israeli Jewish settlers in the West Bank makes it more difficult to reach an agreement than it would if the settlers were not there. While the Israeli settlement drive is not the major obstacle for peace, it certainly does not make it easier to move forward. Even if one agrees, in principle, that all or most of the settlers should be evacuated, the re-settlement of hundreds of thousands in Israel proper would be an enormously difficult project – politically, economically, psychologically and as a sheer human problem. This is something that even those who were – and are – totally opposed to the settlement policy have to admit. Facile calls for "dismantlement of all settlements" ignore these difficult realities and hence as such, are mere "feel good" slogans, not realistic prospects.

And yet, despite this difficult reality, the major obstacle for peace is still the perception held by most Israelis that at the end of the day the Palestinians are not yet reconciled to peace with Israel as the Jewish nation-state.

This can be put in simple language as follows: Since you went to war in 1948 specifically to prevent the establishment of a Jewish state, what is more natural and more fair than to ask you as part of an historical reconciliation to accept that which you once tried to destroy, namely, the Jewish state?

But these obstacles are not easily overcome.

Hence it is my personal conviction that, regretfully, successful peace negotiations are in all probability not going to happen any time soon, and even if the mechanism of negotiations could be resurrected, the chances for a successful outcome are slim. But in the absence of a final status agreement, there are other alternatives available, as has been the case in similar conflicts in Cyprus, Kosovo, Bosnia – or even far away Kashmir: partial agreements, unilateral steps on both sides, de facto understandings which, while not solving "the" problem, diminish tension, create a little bit more trust and minimize friction.

Obstacles are not easily overcome

This calls for a hard-headed realism, not only on the part of the contending parties, but also on the part of the international community which, after all, failed to resolve Cyprus, Kosovo, Bosnia and Kashmir yet contented itself with the less utopian and more realistic goal of trying to achieve a lessening of violence and the creating of a better climate for future negotiations.

This calls for patience, moderation, some mutual understanding – and above all, wisdom.

To this day, many Palestinians are opposed to reconciliation with the Jewish state.

Israel's Declaration of Independence

On the afternoon of Friday, May 14, 1948, in the modest hall at the Tel Aviv Museum, David Ben-Gurion solemnly read out the Declaration of Independence, and the history of the state of Israel began.

Israel's Declaration of Independence proclaimed the establishment of a political and international fact – Jews founded a state. But, like other historical documents, in time it was given to far-reaching interpretation, lending it a status and importance beyond time and place.

Over the years, it became an identity-forming document, a Magna Carta of the civil rights of Jews and Arabs in the State of Israel, as well as the target of parties seeking to delegitimize the existence of a state of Jews. For it is a declaration about the establishment of a state with a Jewish predominance. This is expressed in the name of the state, which was proclaimed "Israel", and in the clause stipulating the state's functions: the first, the defining function of the State of Israel was that it "will be open for Jewish immigration and for the Ingathering of the Exiles". Freedoms, civil rights and equality are listed in the second place.

Anita Shapira

As mentioned, the proclamation was made at the Tel Aviv Museum. Not in Jerusalem, which is invoked in the national anthem in the words, "Eretz Zion, Yerushalayim", but rather in the first Hebrew city, which has no historical past, where prophets did not prophesy and biblical kings did not dwell. Tel Aviv – young, secular, vibrant – symbolized the Zionist deed. But the reason for choosing Tel Aviv was not the symbolism, which nobody gave a thought to at the time; it was simply that Jewish Jerusalem was under siege. The road from Jerusalem to Tel Aviv was cut off, and Jerusalem was under bombardment. As a result, some signature spaces were left empty in the Declaration, since the representatives of the Zionist executive who were meant to affix their names there, were unable to get to the ceremony from Jerusalem.

From the distance of years, Ben-Gurion's declaration of independence seems natural, the obvious decision. But in the historical context of 1948, it was a bold and revolutionary move. And the leaders of the Jewish Yishuv, who felt responsible for the fate of the Jewish People, were extremely anxious about taking the step. In the deliberations held on May 12, it was not at all clear that proclaiming statehood was the right thing to do: perhaps it should be put off for a few months, perhaps a UN mandate would be a better option? Declaring statehood signified an invasion of the regular armies of the Arab states, which were incited by their own incendiary public opinion and rhetoric and caught by their own promises to prevent the establishment of a Jewish state. In the months between the UN Resolution of November 29, 1947 – which decided to partition Palestine and establish there two states, one Jewish, one Arab – and May 15, 1948, when the British evacuated Palestine, the two peoples living in the country were at war.

In a recent speech, President Mahmoud Abbas gave the impression that soon after the UN resolution, the Jews pounced on their peaceful Arab neighbours and started expelling them from Palestine. This is a glaring misrepresentation of the historical record.

The Palestinian Arabs had rejected the UN Partition Resolution and attacked the Jewish Yishuv. They had their reasons, but they started a war, which they hoped to win, and which eventually they lost. It was a harsh war, and the Jews fought for their lives. The exile of some 700,000 Palestinian Arabs was the result of that war.

The beginning of the war boded well for the Arabs. From the Jewish point of view, these were months of bitter fighting, with thousands of casualties, amounting to an inordinately high proportion of the Jewish population, then some 650,000. Until the declaration of statehood, the Jews had managed to hold out, but barely. On that day of marathon deliberations at the People's Council (the Provisional Government), news came of the fall of the Etzion Bloc and the massacre of its defenders by Palestinian Arabs. Golda Meir reported on her meeting with King Abdullah of Transjordan, from whom she learned that he would soon join the invading Arab states.

The question on the agenda of the provisional government was whether the Jewish Yishuv would manage to stand up to the regular armies of Arab states. In the United States, Secretary of State George C. Marshall warned that the Jews would lose the coming war. Haganah commanders, on hand to provide an expert opinion, were not very optimistic. Yigael Yadin, the de facto head of operations of the Haganah, a militia that had only just begun to resemble an army, rated the Yishuv's chances at 50 per cent.

The people participating in the deliberations were highly conscious of how fateful the decision was. A mere three years had passed since the end of the Second World War and there was no escaping the harrowing feeling that, at risk here, was the Jewish People's last hope after the Holocaust.

For the first time in 2,000 years, a state

On the other side of the scales, the British evacuation of the country and ensuing governmental void could be a historic opportunity that would not repeat itself: statehood had to be declared now or maybe never.

The decision to grasp the historic opportunity by the horns rather than let it slip away was not unanimous. After Ben-Gurion's address, which set out both the dangers and the odds, there were six votes in favor of independence, four against. The decision to declare statehood was taken by one vote.

Following the dramatic deliberations on the principle of independence, the discussions about its formulation were almost an anti-climax. But they too reflected the fact that this was a one-time occurrence. Everything was being done for the first time in 2,000 years. Nobody had any prior experience in establishing a state.

The day after the declaration, Jews of Israel, formerly Mandatory Palestine, celebrate.

First, what was the new state to be called? The decision was "Israel." People were concerned about how the name would look in English as a modifier (Israeli government, Israeli forces), as well as about non-technical issues. One question related to the name of the state in Arabic. Members of the People's Council sought a way to make it unnecessary for the state's Arab citizens to use a name unacceptable to them and unrepresentative of them. One idea thrown out was, that in Arabic, the state be called "Western Palestine"; but, if so, what would be the name of the Arab state that was meant to rise? In the end, it was decided to call the state "Israel" also in Arabic. The name reflected the essence of the state as the state of the Jews, just as Finland reflects the Finns even though it has a Swedish minority, and Britain – the Britons, whoever they may be.

Another question was: who was to proclaim it? What legitimacy did the provisional government have?

The transition from the British Mandate to Jewish rule had left a vacuum that had to be filled. A war was going on outside, an army had to be set up, people conscripted, money raised. State institutions had to be founded to prevent anarchy, to ensure central authority and the young state's monopoly over the use of force.

Ben-Gurion had prudently set up a temporary body embracing representatives of the Yishuv and the Zionist Movement, which, for all intents and purposes represented the Jewish People. It was a broad wall-to-wall coalition of religious and secular, right and left. For the Declaration to have legitimacy, its signatories had to be regarded as a representative body by all parts of the Yishuv and of the Jewish People.

It took effort to prevent friction at the crucial moment. For example, there was the question of how to refer to God in the Declaration. The formulators had the model of the American Declaration of Independence, which states: "with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence". This was the American compromise between Thomas Jefferson's secular version and the more religious version of his colleagues. But in Palestine in 1948 the idea of Divine Providence was unacceptable. Zionism was essentially a secular movement, though it used religious symbols and myths deriving from religion.

After the declaration, Tel Aviv was bombed

For the Zionist Left, the insertion of God into the Declaration was a casus belli. For the religious Zionists, His omission was equally unacceptable. Wise men therefore came up with the compromise of using the expression "Rock of Israel". The term originates in Jewish liturgy and refers to the Almighty, sometimes in conjunction with the words "and its Redeemer". But over the years, "Rock of Israel" had taken on also a more literal connotation, meaning the force and perseverance of the Jewish People. The term could thus be freely interpreted according to the dictates of one's heart. As a result, the Declaration could be signed by representatives of both the religious Agudat Yisrael Party and the non-religious Communist Party.

One topic was omitted from the declaration: the borders of the state about to rise. In terms of international law, the UN Resolution of November 29, 1947 was considered the state's founding document. The Declaration's text thus stated that "This recognition by the United Nations of the right of the Jewish people to establish their State is irrevocable" – for, meanwhile, voices had already been raised at the UN to reconvene the Assembly and revoke the Resolution, yet another indication of how fragile and shaky everything was at the time.

Legal experts argued for a proclamation that the state would be within the borders of the UN Partition Plan. Ben-Gurion rejected this demand. The American Declaration of Independence, too, did not mention borders, he stated. If the UN Partition Plan would be carried out, he explained, the Jews would accept its borders. But if the Arabs invade the State of Israel, the borders would be a consequence of the balance of forces. If we can, he believed, we will expand the borders.

Ultimately, the Green Line, which was the state boundary until 1967, was a more inclusive demarcation line than that set down in the Partition Plan. Had the Arabs been willing to discuss recognizing Israel, in the 19 years between 1948 and the Six Day War, the discussion would have been about the borders of the Partition Plan. After 1967, they began to talk of the Green Line as the defining border. Borders indeed, are mutable and have no place in a permanent document.

The first part of the Declaration explains the right of the Jewish People to establish a state in the Land of Israel. The bond of the Jews to Eretz Israel in the Declaration is not anchored in the divine promise the Lord made to Abraham, but in the "historic and traditional attachment" of Jews to "their ancient homeland". The insertion of the historic bond into the Declaration of Independence was meant, by way of the Zionist narrative, to affirm that the Jews are not imperialists who come to conquer a foreign land: "After being forcibly exiled from their land, the people remained faithful to it throughout their Dispersion and never ceased to pray and hope for their return to it and for the restoration in it of their political freedom." But historic right alone does not suffice. According to the Zionist narrative, right is given validity by the fact that Jews immigrated to the country, built it, fought for it and created a community there capable of maintaining a viable state. In other words, it is a valid right because the Jewish Yishuv in the Land of Israel is national in character and claims for itself the right of self-determination: "aspiring towards independent nationhood". This is the connection between the "natural right" of the Jews, like any other people "to be masters of their own fate" as stated in the Declaration, and the Jewish historic right that situates this natural right in Eretz Israel. The Holocaust appears in the Declaration as one component demonstrating the need of the Jewish People for a state of their own, but this is not what bestows right. Right is bestowed by the positive, creative power of the Jewish People whose actions demonstrated their capability to be a nation with a state of their own.

Following the declaration of Independence, the people in Tel Aviv rejoiced and spent the evening and night dancing in the streets and uttering the Hallel prayer in the synagogues. But the fighters along the borders had no time for rejoicing. They were busy fighting a war of survival, and they had no heart for ceremonies and declarations. As far as they were concerned, the declaration passed unnoticed. Ben-Gurion, as usual reticent and subdued, wrote in his diary: "At 4 p.m. Jewish independence was proclaimed and the state was established. Its fate is in the hands of the Security Forces".

That night, Tel Aviv was bombed.

This was the beginning.

Partition vote in 1947: myth and reality

Most visitors coming to Kibbutz Bror Chayil, in the northern Negev, not very far from the Gaza Strip, are proudly shown a historical object on display there: the polished wood chairman's hammer used by Osvaldo Aranha, the Brazilian President of the UN General Assembly in 1947 who presided over the crucial Nov. 29 session when the Palestine partition resolution was approved. The display goes on to assert that had it not been for Aranha's overt sympathy for the Jewish cause, his extraordinary efforts on behalf of the Jews and the liberties he took with UN procedures, the partition resolution would never had achieved the necessary two thirds majority of the vote.

Thus, unintentionally, members of the kibbutz, many of them from Brazil and sentimentally attached to their old country, contribute to and reinforce the Palestinian myth that the 1947 partition resolution did not represent the true will of the UN members at that time, but rather it was the result of Zionist and American bribes, threats and pressures and the abrogation of UN procedures.

This contention, which was voiced immediately after the vote, has gained currency over the years. It has become a favoured weapon in the arsenal of the Palestinian leaders in their attempts to challenge the legitimacy of the State of Israel.

Aranha did indeed take some procedural liberties to pave the road for the smooth passage of the resolution, but it was quite historically clear, on the record, that the position of the Zionists on the eve of the final vote was quite promising.

Yehoshua Freundlich

In a preliminary vote taken on Nov. 25 in the Ad Hoc Committee, a special committee established by the General Assembly to deal with the Palestine issue, the pro-Israel advocates managed to garner 25 positive votes, merely two votes short of the necessary required majority. A large group of 17 countries remained undecided. Of these however, some were favourably inclined to vote in support of partition.

Despite the indications for a positive outcome immediately prior to the Nov. 29 vote, the pro-Zionists were actively engaged in lobbying.

The four days that elapsed between the preliminary and the final vote saw feverish advocacy by Jews and by Arabs on behalf of their respective positions. There were many conversations on both sides with a great many parties. To be sure, some promises were made and then withdrawn. Undoubtedly, pressure was applied where it seemed beneficial to do so. However, there is no evidence that actual threats were made against anyone or that any actual agreements were executed.

The outcome of the pre-vote lobbying was that the pro-Zionists succeeded in reducing the number of abstainers from 17 to 10. But it was more than a four day effort that led to success. The favourable outcome was the result of a combination of factors: a long year of diplomatic and political activity by a determined and experienced leadership, the special and unique position of the Jews at that time in the international arena, and the crucial advantages that the Jewish Yishuv as a government-in-waiting had over the Arab community in Palestine.

In addition, we can say with a fair amount of certainty that without the co-operation between the Soviet Union, the United States and most other western countries, a positive outcome to the Palestine question (as it was then known in reference to a Jewish homeland) would have been possible.

Even today, after the partial release of archival documentation from the former Soviet Union, we are still uncertain as to the motivation of the Soviet Union in joining hands with the United States to support the partition resolution. The first indication that the USSR was abandoning its pro-Arab, anti-Zionist line, at least for the partition vote, was given by Andrei Gromyko, the Soviet ambassador to the UN in a somewhat ambiguous speech he made during the debate in the UN Special Assembly in May 1947. But observers could not be certain about Soviet intentions. Over the ensuing months however, any doubts about the Soviet position were set aside. By the end of September most people knew that the Soviet delegation in New York was instructed to support the partition proposal.

Reading between the lines of the diplomatic correspondence between Moscow and its emissaries in New York, it is evident that the Soviet delegates were dumbfounded by this volte face, about face, in the Kremlin.

Soviet support was crucial to success

However, knowing that this pro-partition decision had been taken at the highest quarters in the Kremlin, the New York delegates followed their instructions to the letter, giving full support to the pro-Zionist delegates during the long, intricate deliberations at the General Assembly. A passerby in the corridors of the UN headquarters would often observe the scene of Moshe Sharett, the chief Zionist delegate, conversing and even trading secrets with his Soviet colleague Semen Tsarapkin. After the many long discussions in the various committees and subcommittees, the Soviet Bloc representatives raised their hands in unison at the appropriate moments.

Soviet support was crucial to the Zionist success not only because it assured the pro-Zionist cause five votes (Yugoslavia abstained) but because it transformed the Palestine issue away from a purely western supported issue into a broadly UN supported one, transcending east-west rivalries and thus facilitating the support of countries that voted on the merits of the case free from the bonds of their respective global political alignment.

Another factor that gave the Zionists a decisive advantage over their Arab adversaries was the relative weakness of the Arab community in Palestine as compared to that of the Jewish Yishuv.

World War II and the Holocaust, in a tragic turn of history, or if you wish, in an ironic turn of history, destroyed the Jewish communities in Europe but at the same time witnessed the coming of age of the Jewish community of Palestine.

This resulted for a number of reasons. The war effectively secluded the Jews in Palestine from the Jews in Europe and the rest of the world. The Jews in the Yishuv were forced to take preparatory measures against what was then thought to be an imminent German invasion. At the same time, the Jewish leadership in Mandatory Palestine waged a political struggle against the incumbent British Mandatory administration.

The cumulative effect of the situation was to forge a viable, confident, largely self-sufficient community with an able leadership that was wise enough to define an achievable and consensual political aim.

The UN Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP), a select committee of 11 nations representative of the composition of the UN with the exclusion of the Big Powers and the Arab states, visited Palestine in the summer of 1947. The Arabs boycotted the visiting committee members. But the Yishuv leadership extended their full cooperation to them.

The committee members formed two major impressions from their visit to Mandatory Palestine: First, that it was totally academic to discuss whether or not to establish a Jewish state in Palestine, as such a state already existed with a stable political structure, viable economy, outstanding educational system and adequate defense system. Second, that despite the guarded public statements by the Zionist leadership, they were striving to achieve a sensible solution in the shape of "a viable Jewish state in an adequate part of Palestine."

The majority of the committee proposed to partition Palestine into three parts: a Jewish state, an Arab state and an international state for Jerusalem and its immediate environs. Once the committee announced their proposal, there was no way back. The die was cast.

The Zionists understood they had two choices: Either they accept the majority report to implement at least a part of their national dream or they reject it and opt for a confrontation with the UN and deal with the resulting uncertain consequences.

The Zionists, of course, accepted the decision of the majority of the committee. There is no doubt that by accepting the compromise solution, swallowing the bitter pill of, inter alia, abandoning Jerusalem, reflected the tradition and the mentality of the Mapai party, which was then the core of the Yishuv leadership. This middle way, pragmatic, gradualist group opted for an immediate consensual solution within the framework of the UN-supervised process.

In an unprecedented demonstration of national solidarity and collective responsibility, the other parties – from left and right – buried their ideological differences, at least for the duration of the UN debate, and agree to the position taken by the majority Mapai leadership.

The decision of the Zionist leadership (representing the Jewish Palestinians) stood in stark contrast to the behaviour of the Arab Palestinians. The Arabs ignored the UNSCOP proposal and opted instead only for their maximalist aim, namely, the establishment of a single unified state in Palestine that for intents and purposes would make Palestine an Arab country.

Looking back, it is clear, that the Jews had an enormous advantage over the Arabs as far as leadership and organization were concerned. There is no need to dwell on the characters and personalities of David Ben-Gurion and Moshe Sharett, who were then in their prime, complementing each other's skills and abilities with effective, collegial collaboration and co-operation.

Much less however is known about the dedicated group of Zionist diplomats and functionaries who worked in Palestine, New York and other places to help bring about the successful vote for partition: Abba Eban, David Horowitz, Elias Sasson, Walter Eytan, Eliahu Elath, Moshe Toff and many others. These people were endowed with keen diplomatic skill, sharp political acumen, wide linguistic capabilities and a wise sense of human understanding that far surpassed the abilities of their adversaries. It could be said without exaggeration that never in the history of Zionist and Israeli history has there been such a concentration of talents, capabilities, commitment and dedication as there was represented in the group of Zionist activists engaged in the diplomatic struggle in 1947.

There was drama in the air

Another factor that assisted the Zionists during the UN partition deliberation was that, unlike their Palestinian and Arab counterparts, they were playing on their home turf, so to speak. They were working and living in New York City, the largest Jewish city in the world, in an ambience that radiated support and encouragement. During the open sessions of the debates many in the audience were Jewish. The Arab delegates did not fail to notice that.

Municipal and other officials who were Jewish assisted the Zionist delegation in many ways. It has now come to light that the pro-partition forces had access to telephone communications of and among the Arab delegates apparently through the aid of Jewish employees of the telephone company.

In addition, practically all of the representative organizations and agencies of American Jews, such as Jewish labour organizations and the prestigious American Jewish Committee and even some that had previously not supported the idea of a Jewish homeland, helped the pro-partition forces. Intra-communal rivalries were put aside to present a unified Jewish front in the battle for a sovereign Jewish homeland. Reform Jews joined hands with the Orthodox Jews.

Finally, there remained the vexing question of the influence of the Holocaust on the events that preceded the UN partition resolution. In the years following the UN resolution two schools of thought regarding this issue evolved in Israeli historiography. One denied any, or almost any, impact of the Holocaust on the deliberations at the UN. The opposing line of thought suggested that the passage of the vote for partition on November 29 was a direct outcome of the Holocaust.

The first school attributed the 1947 vote to the gradual growth and development of the Yishuv, to its political and military struggle with the British Administration and its sophisticated exploitation of the unique international situation then. They regard the establishment of Israel as an early example in a long series of examples of post-World War II decolonization.

The other school, sometimes pejoratively called the sentimental school, regards the 1947 resolution and the eventual establishment of Israel as a belated act of justice administered by the international community after the horrific events of the Shoah.

I agree with the first school, with a special emphasis on the crucial role played by the resourceful, vigorous Jewish community in Palestine. Based on some documentary evidence that I have seen, however, it is also my opinion that the lessons and memories of the Holocaust were a vital background factor. They were essential in helping form a unified Jewish and Zionist front that helped tip the scales in favour of partition.

When the UN General Assembly convened on Nov. 29 for its final vote, the fate of the partition resolution had been already sealed. It was decided during the long preceding year of discussions, debates, deliberations and the UNSCOP investigation in Palestine. There was indeed drama in the air on Nov. 29, 1947. Last-ditch efforts continued up to the very last moment. Heads were counted until the last delegate, from Yugoslavia, voiced his abstaining vote.

But the final result was ensured months before.

Do Palestinian refugees have the right to return?

The return of the Palestinian refugees and their descendants to the State of Israel is one of the most difficult issues facing the parties as they seek to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian dispute.

According to the Palestinians, the refugees and their descendants have a right to return to the homes that they left between the years 1947 and 1949. In contrast, the State of Israel vehemently opposes recognizing the right of return and extensive entry of Palestinian refugees into its territory as part of the solution to the dispute. The State of Israel sees this as an existential danger to the national home in which the Jewish people seek to implement their right to self-determination.

The problem of the Palestinian refugees: basic facts

The "right of return" claimed by the Palestinians is an outcome of the Palestinian refugee problem that arose following the War of Independence waged in Palestine from the end of 1947 to the beginning of 1949. On Nov. 29, 1947, the UN General Assembly adopted Resolution 181 regarding the termination of the British Mandate and the partition of Mandatory Palestine into two states – Jewish and Arab – on the basis of the nationality of their population. The Arab inhabitants of the land and the Arab states, apart from King Abdullah of Jordan, rejected the partition plan. As long as the British Mandate continued, their rejection of the plan was expressed by a violent struggle within the area of western Palestine. Upon the termination of the mandate, the leadership of the Jewish community declared the establishment of the State of Israel, and the armies of the Arab states invaded. These events led to the departure of hundreds of thousands of Arabs from the territory of Mandatory Palestine occupied by the Jews. The UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) has estimated the number of people who left at about 750,000. About 150,000 Arabs remained within the boundaries of the State of Israel. In the area of Palestine, which remained under Arab control, not a single Jew stayed behind. All the Jewish inhabitants fled or were killed or captured.

Yaffa Zilbershats

The reasons for the departure of the Palestinian Arab inhabitants of Palestine are disputed: there are those who argue that the refugees fled because they feared the fighting or heeded the calls of local leaders or the leaders of the neighbouring Arab states to leave their homes in order not to interfere with the fighting, and intended to return home following victory. Others claim that these people were expelled by force from the areas controlled by the State of Israel. Today, the detailed description given by historian Benny Morris is commonly accepted, to the effect that some of the refugees indeed fled and others were deported, even though these acts of deportation were not part of a preordained plan.

These refugees were excluded from the application of the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees of 1951 and from the protection of the UN High Commission for Refugees. As of 1950, they have been protected, by virtue of a UN resolution, within UNRWA. UNRWA now functions as a huge relief agency. It handles approximately 4.8 million people yet refrains from rehabilitating the refugees. This figure stems from the organization's broad definition of a Palestinian refugee. The UNRWA definition, unlike the definition given in the Refugees Convention, includes the descendants of the refugees who left Mandatory Palestine as well as those who have received citizenship in the countries in which they have since settled. In addition, many Palestinians who live outside UNRWA's area of operation see themselves as Palestinian refugees who are entitled to return to the territory of the State of Israel.

The right of return viewed through the prism of international law

The Palestinians base the refugees' right of return on international law. The following considers the various sources of international law concerning related issues with the purpose of examining whether they vest the Palestinian refugees and their descendants with a right to return

• UN resolutions relating to Palestinians do not vest the Palestinian refugees with a right to return to the State of Israel. The primary resolution upon which the Palestinians base their claim to a right to return is UN General Assembly Resolution 194(III) of 1948.

This resolution was adopted following the submission of the Bernadotte report, an element of the UN attempt to reach a political solution that would settle the conflict. The resolution deals with a proposal for mediation and conciliation between Jews and Arabs, and mentions the issue of the refugees in Article 11. Article 11 is usually quoted alone and out of context. To understand this article, it is essential to recall the context and look at the resolution as a whole.

Important parts of the resolution were not implemented, such as the demilitarization of Jerusalem, guaranteeing free access to it, and imposition of an international regime there. Notably, Article 11, concerned with the refugee problem, was not implemented.

Today, no one would contemplate continuing the mediation efforts of the Conciliation Commission, nor persist in treating Jerusalem as an international city, without the consent of both sides. It would seem therefore that Article 11, too, should be seen as a part of the resolution that was not implemented and is open for re-examination and not as a declaration that stands alone forever.

However, beyond this critical context, a perusal of Article 11 itself fails to support the argument that the article recognizes the right of the Palestinian refugees to return to their homes:

1) The provision does not use the language of rights, even though Bernadotte's recommendations included a recommendation to recognize such a right. In other words, there was a clear appreciation of the distinction between the language used by the article and the determination that it was the right of the refugees to return to their homes.

2) The UN resolution includes a condition whereby only refugees wishing to "live at peace with their neighbours" should be allowed to return to the State of Israel. The Palestinians denied the legitimacy of Resolution 194(III) for many years because of this condition, on the ground that obligating them to live in peace with the Israelis would also indirectly compel them to recognize the existence of the State of Israel. Israel, for its part, interpreted this condition as releasing it from the duty to allow return of the Palestinian refugees to its territory so long as comprehensive peace has not been attained with all the Arab countries in the region, and so long as the return of the Palestinian refugees may endanger its security. The inclusion of this condition in the language of Article 11 greatly weakens the argument that it grants a legal right to return.

3) The resolution refers to the return of the refugees to their homes. The majority of Palestinians defined today as "refugees" according to UNRWA's definition, are not persons who fled from their homes but rather are the descendants of those people. Accordingly, the return of the majority of these refugees cannot meet the condition of "return to their homes" because the persons concerned are not the refugees themselves but their descendants.

Haj Amin El Husseini, Mufti of Jerusalem, rejected all resolutions in the name of Palestinians, that allowed for a Jewish state.

4) Such an interpretation of Article 11 is consistent with the second part of the article that deals with the Conciliation Commission's function not only of aiding the return of the refugees but also aiding their resettlement and their social and economic rehabilitation. The goal was to deal appropriately with the refugee problem that had arisen and certainly not to perpetuate the problem in such a way that not a single refugee would be allowed to be absorbed or resettled elsewhere.

Another argument against the assertion that Resolution 194(III) creates a basis for the right to return stems from the manner in which the resolution was perceived at the time it was adopted. We have seen that the Arab states and the Palestinians rejected the resolution because they saw it as a demand to recognize the State of Israel. It is not reasonable to isolate the provision in the resolution granting permission to the Palestinian refugees to return to their homes in order to reduce the violence and end the war through the creation of two states, and give that provision a construction that undermines the logic of two states. Similarly, the State of Israel took the view that the resolution was not binding on it when the resolution was adopted by the General Assembly. It is illogical to argue years later that a resolution that was rejected by the Palestinians and the Israelis when it was adopted is the source of law binding these parties today.

Subsequent resolutions of the UN General Assembly recognize the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and the right of the Palestinians to return to their homes. In contrast, Security Council resolutions 237 and 242 of 1967 and 338 of 1973 call for a "just" solution to the Palestinian problem but make no reference whatsoever to their "right to return." It is these decisions of the Security Council that are binding in the relations between the Israelis and the Palestinians, as the Oslo agreements signed by the two parties vest them with binding force following their adoption by the parties.

Israel may prevent entry of Palestinians

• International human rights laws do not provide uniform definitions regarding the scope of the right to freedom of movement, on which, on occasion, the right to return is allegedly based. One of the important documents pertaining to this subject relied on by the Palestinians, is the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of 1966. Article 12(4) of the covenant prohibits the imposition of arbitrary restrictions on the right of a person to enter his own country. For the Palestinians, Israel is not "their country," and even if it is regarded as their country, the restriction on their entry is not arbitrary. The State of Israel is entitled to prevent the entry of the Palestinians into its territory, and a fortiori the entry of their descendants, as such a development might endanger the existence of the state and the exercise of the Jewish People's right to self-determination within it. This reasoning is also relevant in relation to restricting the entry into Israel of a Palestinian who has married a citizen of the country and wishes to settle in the country within the framework of family unification. It should also be noted that Article 12(4) was not intended to apply in cases of mass displacement of people because of ethnic conflict and that there is no ground that this article vests a right of return to the descendants of those who left their home.

Nor too, do international nationality laws impose a duty on the State of Israel to grant citizenship to Palestinian refugees. The general international conventions and those dealing specifically with the question of citizenship provide for the right of every person to citizenship, but there is no express obligation on the part of any particular state to grant such citizenship. Arrangements for the granting of citizenship to those leaving the state in cases of uti possidetis – i.e., in situations where large movements of people are generated as a result of war that has led to border changes – have not yet been formulated in binding rules and therefore are not legally binding in the context of the issue of Palestinian refugees.

• International refugee law is primarily defined by the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees of 1951. This convention provides for the right of the refugees not to be deported to the country from which they escaped and in which their lives or freedom are in danger. Global practice over the years testifies to the fact that states have not interpreted this right as indirectly providing for the duty of the original state to permit the return of the refugees. Similarly, the Statute of the Office of the UN High Commission for Refugees of 1950 provides that return is merely one of the possible ways of resolving refugee problems. Irrespective of the above, the Refugees Convention has excluded the Palestinian refugees from its purview and in accordance with UN decisions has made them the responsibility of UNRWA. At the same time, the latter agency has not been tasked with dealing with the return of the Palestinians.

• Humanitarian law and international criminal law that concern the protection of civilians and combatants in time of war and in its aftermath do not contain a provision regarding the right of return of refugees. They do prohibit forcible deportation. However, even if the problem of refugees was caused in part by the deportation of a population from the area of Mandatory Palestine, international law does not contain any norm that requires the refugees to be allowed to return to the original country as a remedy for illegal deportation.

Resolution of political and ethnic disputes in mixed societies: separation versus reintegration

An examination of precedents from around the world relating to the resolution of ethnic disputes in which the fate of many refugees is involved reveals a variety of solutions for dealing with this issue.

Until the end of the Cold War, namely, also when the problem of the Palestinian refugees arose, legitimate and even preferred solution for ethnic disputes was the forced exchange of populations. The premise was that such a solution contributed to the stabilization of the states suffering from ethnic tensions. This was the case in relation to the peace agreements between Greece and Bulgaria in 1919 and between Turkey and Greece in 1923. Similarly, at the time of the partition of India into India and Pakistan in 1947, an exchange of populations involving millions of people was carried out with the aim of separating two disputing ethnic groups.

In retrospect, it is possible to regard the absorption of hundreds of thousands of Jewish refugees from the Arab states in Israel, which took place at the same time as the escape or deportation of Palestinian refugees to the neighbouring Arab states, as such an exchange of populations. The new reality that evolved could have provided a fitting infrastructure for the settlement of the dispute. However, unlike the State of Israel, the Arab states in general did not take measures to absorb the refugees and resettle them but rather encouraged the preservation of the refugee situation and the aspiration to return to the territory of the State of Israel.

Following the end of the Cold War, the process of population exchange was defined as ethnic cleansing and was absolutely prohibited by international law. Return was adopted by the states – particularly by the states absorbing refugees – as the preferred solution for the problems of refugees that had been created by ethnic disputes. However, in many cases this policy encountered difficulties and sometimes was not capable of being implemented at all. In Cyprus, the secretary general of the United Nations, Kofi Annan, made a proposal to the populations in the two sections of the island in an effort to resolve the refugee problem, which had been created about 35 years earlier. His proposal included a minimal return of refugees, so that each ethnic community could remain a majority in its own territory. Annan based his proposal by emphasizing the decades that have passed since the people who ask for return fled their homes. His proposal shows that the international community concurs that even at this time a legitimate solution to a long-lasting ethnic dispute that had resulted in many refugees will not necessarily include the extensive return of refugees to their original place of residence.

A political solution of two states for two peoples is needed

This view is supported by a recent judgment of the European Court of Human Rights that, in a decision adopted on March 5, 2010, accepted Annan's approach and rejected the claim of Greek Cypriots to return to their homes in northern Cyprus.

Summary

The unequivocal position that Palestinians do not possess a right to return to the State of Israel is based on three principal grounds. First, the legal analysis proves definitively that international law does not grant the Palestinian refugees a right to compel Israel to allow them to settle in its territory. Second, the experience of other ethnic conflicts, past or present, shows that return to a place where conflicts existed and are not completely resolved is not possible. Third, the entry into Israel of Palestinian refugees and their descendants in large numbers will hamper the continuing existence of a Jewish majority in the state and would be contrary to the right of Jews to self-determination. Nor would the return to the State of Israel be in the best interest of the refugees themselves, since they possess personal and group characteristics that differ significantly from those of the majority population. A political solution of two states for two peoples is needed to enable both the Jewish people and the Palestinians to pursue their right to self-determination. Jews have a right to return to the State of Israel, while Palestinians do not. They will have a right to return to their own state on its establishment.

Yaffa Zilbershats, the former dean of the faculty of Law at Bar-Ilan University, teaches international and constitutional law there. This article is expanded upon in the position paper of the Metzilah Center: The Return of Palestinian Refugees to the State of Israel, at www.metzilah.org.il.

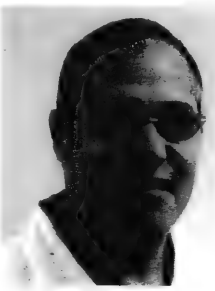
What's the meaning of a sovereign Palestinian state?

Mahmoud Abbas, sitting in Ramallah and acting in his capacity as leader of the Fatah faction of the PLO and president of the Palestinian Authority (PA), has asked the General Assembly to recognize a sovereign Palestinian state. It was not the first time.

In 1948, Haj Amin al-Husseini, while sitting in his home in Gaza and acting in his capacity as the mufti of Jerusalem, declared that Palestine was an independent sovereign state. In 1988, Yasser Arafat, while sitting in Algiers and acting in his capacity as chair of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) and in conjunction with a resolution of the Palestine National Council, likewise declared Palestine to be a newly sovereign state.

From an international law point of view, what's the point of all of this? Given the repeated historical declarations, what does a UN-endorsed declaration of Palestinian statehood really mean?

In international legal terms, a declaration by a large number of General Assembly members could signify widespread recognition of a new state. This, of course, could potentially advance the Palestinian legal cause, since recognition has been considered to be a crucial element in the achievement of international status.



Ed Morgan

This point was made with respect to the early Soviet Union by Judge Benjamin Cardozo, one of the most renowned Jewish jurists of the twentieth century, when he stated from the bench of the New York Court of Appeals that, "Juridically, a government that is unrecognized may be viewed as no government at all..." As Taiwan – an unrecognized entity that otherwise enjoys all the attributes of state sovereignty – has long understood, a country without recognition is, in international legal terms, what Duddy Kravitz' grandfather understood what a man without land was: nobody.

On the other hand, recognition alone does not a sovereign make. Like the World War II-era Polish government-in-exile, which was easily abandoned by its allies at the Yalta conference of 1945, recognition of an entity that otherwise doesn't qualify for statehood does not give it juridical, rights-enforcing stature. Indeed, no one has learned the lesson better than the Palestinians themselves. Since the Algiers declaration of 1988, over 100 states have recognized Palestine as a state. In addition, the PLO has membership in the Arab League and a number of other international organizations, and has bilateral relations and a consular presence with nations all over the world.

What Palestine has lacked isn't recognition as a sovereign state, but rather the ability to act like a sovereign state.

A U.S. federal court had the opportunity to consider the point in Ungar v. Palestinian Authority, a terror victims' lawsuit where the defense contended that Palestine meets all of the international qualifications for statehood, which would in turn give it legal immunity if sued in the domestic courts of other states. The State of Israel has itself benefitted from this defense, successfully fending off law suits in U.S. courts on the basis that, as a sovereign state, it cannot be forced into a foreign state's courts and has never voluntarily "indicated its amenability to suit".

The Palestinians, by contrast, have lost this argument every time they have raised it. As the court put it in Ungar, "the PA and PLO do not meet and are not part of any entity that meets the criteria for statehood because they do not sufficiently control Palestine..."

In the case of Israel, the General Assembly voted in November 1947 for the creation of both a Jewish state and an Arab state on termination of British rule in Palestine. International lawyers understand, however, that it was not the General Assembly resolution that created the State of Israel; indeed, if that were the case there would have been no need for any further efforts to create a State of Palestine – including this September effort at the UN – since both states would have been established by the Partition resolution.

A year and a half later, in May 1949, the State of Israel was admitted to membership in the United Nations. Likewise, however, this act by the international organization did not establish Israeli statehood any more than the previous one had, since the UN Charter's criteria require those admitted to full membership to already be sovereign states. It was at some point in between these two events that the Israeli state came into existence.

It was, of course, the Israeli government's assertion of state-like control over its territory and affairs that established Israel's sovereign existence. Israel's own declaration of independence in May 1948, its establishment of full control of the territory and apparatuses of statehood even in the fact of the ensuing war with Egypt, Jordan and others, and its capacity to not only call itself a state but to act like one, is what gave it its recognizable legal status. Until now, no equivalent Palestinian entity – i.e. one not only calling for statehood but demonstrating a capacity to carry out the functions of statehood – has emerged.

It is possible that all of this is changing. The IMF and the World Bank reported this past spring, in a document entitled "Palestinian State-building: A Decisive Period," that the PA is now ready to assume full sovereignty. The report noted that, although some obstacles remain (the split with Hamas in Gaza being the most notable of these), Prime Minister Salem Fayed's economic and administrative reforms have created a governing entity in the Palestinian territories that is ready to take on the mantle of statehood.

Israeli Prime Minister Netanyahu's anxious response has been a reminder that Palestine's accession to sovereign status could redound to Israel's detriment. Among other things, statehood would allow Palestine to sign the International Criminal Court treaty and threaten prosecutions against any Israeli soldier or politician who commits that treaty's loosely defined "war crimes" on its territory. Moreover, Israel's West Bank settlements, which are already the cause of controversy, will inevitably be characterized as one state's forcible presence in another sovereign's domain, an international sin far worse than the current status quo.

Indeed, it is the continued Israeli presence in Palestinian territory that the IMF and World Bank have identified as the most difficult hurdle in achieving new legal status. The 1933 Montevideo Convention on the Rights and Duties of States – the leading legal instrument on the subject – identifies complete control of one's territory as an essential ingredient in the making of a state.

In this respect, however, the IMF and World Bank have their focus wrong. The challenge for the Palestinians is not so much dealing with their neighbour and adversary: a path – call it a very bumpy roadmap – is already drawn for achieving accommodation with the Israelis.

The blueprint for this was pronounced in the well known land-for-peace formula set out in Resolution 242, which the U.N. Security Council passed in the aftermath of the 1967 Six Day War. Under this arrangement, Israel is to give up land it occupied during that conflict (with the precise amount of land and ultimate borders to be negotiated between the parties,) in return for an end to the state of belligerency by Israel's neighbours. The situation is somewhat complicated by the fact that there are already full peace treaties in place with two of the three main Six Day War adversaries (Syria being the remaining belligerent,) and the land that was occupied in the conflict is no longer claimed by them. Nevertheless, with the PA stepping up to the plate, the way ahead for Israel and a future Palestine is already marked out.

The real legal challenge for a Palestinian state is in dealing with its own population.

This point was made early in Israel's history by the International Court of Justice in the Reparations Case of 1949. In the well known incident giving rise to the court case, a United Nations diplomat, Swedish Count Folke Bernadotte, who had mediated the 1948 armistice between Israel and Jordan, was assassinated by members of Lehi – the violent Jewish underground that the British named the "Stern Gang" after its founder Avraham Stern. The murder took place in an Israeli-held part of West Jerusalem.

It was clear under international law that had Bernadotte been in the service of his native Sweden, the Swedish government could have claimed reparation payments from the young Israeli state. The novel question of the Reparations Case however, was whether the U.N. could stand in the shoes of a sovereign state in claiming for a diplomat who had been seconded to the international body.

The Reparation Case made new law at the time by holding that the UN is an international rights holder just as entitled to compensation as any of its member states. What is more noteworthy today, however, is not so much that the UN could receive compensation, but that Israel had to pay it. After all, the Stern organization was a renegade group, labeled "terrorist" by the British and banned by the new Israeli government. What the international court made clear in its ruling was that that a sovereign state, including a brand new one, is legally responsible for any violent acts that emanate from its territory – including the violent acts of groups over which it has no control.

Should the Palestinians receive their sought-for sovereign recognition by the United Nations, the implications of the Reparation Case should be obvious. It has become a predictable part of the region's politics that attacks on Israel are credited to groups beyond the PLO or the PA's control. Typically, Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah wing points to the al-Aqsa Martyrs or to Hamas as the ones responsible for attacks from the West Bank; Hamas does the same, and points to Islamic Jihad or to Al Qaeda-related groups as being responsible for attacks from Gaza. For a legally sovereign state, however, this kind of deflection will not work.

A Palestinian state will have to step up and take charge of policing all of its various factions in the same way that the early Israeli state did. In particular, it will necessarily assume full international liability for all bombers, missiles, and other terror attacks coming from its territory. A legally sovereign state, in other words, doesn't only bring rights; it brings responsibilities.

The Palestinians have long claimed that they cannot live without full sovereignty. The question after this fall at the U.N. will be whether they can live with it.

The laundering of delegitimization

"Delegitimization" has become a buzzword of discourse to denote the assault on Israel's legitimacy, if not also its right to exist, spawning thereby a veritable conference industry on this topic. However, the real issue is not so much delegitimization, but the laundering or masking of that delegitimization under the cover of law, sometimes known as "lawfare". More importantly, this phenomenon is not simply prejudicial to democracies like Israel, but it undermines the rule of law itself while posing a threat to international peace and security.

Simply put, if war is the continuation of politics by other means, as Clausewitz put it, then "lawfare" is the waging of war – the war of delegitimization – under the cover of law.

Nonetheless, despite all the attention it presently enjoys, delegitimization is not a new phenomenon. Indeed, the phenomenon – if not the idiom itself – has always been with us. It found original expression in the reference to Israel in 1948 as "an original sin." It was the precursor to the Six Day War when Israel was spoken of as "a congenital act of aggression." It first found institutional and juridical expression in the United Nations' "Zionism is Racism" resolution of 1975, which the late US Senator Daniel Moynihan characterized as "giving the abomination of antisemitism the appearance of international legal sanction."

Irwin Cotler

Indeed, I write at an important moment of remembrance and reminder in the delegitimization, lawfare, UN, and human rights configuration – on the eve of the 36th anniversary of this "Zionism is Racism" resolution laundered under the protective cover of the UN while invoking the imprimatur of international law.

The year 2011 is also the 36th anniversary of the birth of the International Bill of Rights – the ratification of both the International Covenants on Civil and Political Rights and Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights – which inspired then US Congressman, Father Robert Drinan, to write that "the elevation of human rights into an international juridical norm is the most dramatic development in the history of contemporary jurisprudence."

As a law professor and human rights lawyer at the time, I found myself witness to, and involved with, two parallel and intersecting universes: First, the universe of the human rights and legal revolution, which underpinned the struggle for Soviet Jewry; and, second, the obverse side of the legal revolution – which has also come to be known as lawfare – the use and abuse of law invoked for delegitimization purposes.

Indeed, a case study of the convergence of the two universes – of the human rights/legal revolution on the one hand, and delegitimization/lawfare under the cover of that human rights/legal revolution on the other – and which was taking place at the same time as the UN "Zionism is Racism" resolution – went largely unnoticed. Simply put, a critical mass of delegitimization – of lawfare – of the laundering of that delegitimization under the protective covers of international law, human rights, and the United Nations under "all that was good", was proceeding under the radar screen.

In particular, using the United Nations specialized agencies as a case study, Israel was held out to be:

- "The enemy of trade unionism." Evidence: The resolution of the International Labour Organization condemning [alleged] Israeli suppression of Palestinian workers;
- "The enemy of health." Evidence: The resolution of the World Health Organization, condemning the [alleged] poisoning of Palestinians on the West Bank;
- "The enemy of culture." Evidence: The resolution of UNESCO condemning [alleged] Israeli desecration of historic sites in Jerusalem;

Palestinian cause the poster child of human rights

• "The enemy of women." Evidence: The resolution of the UN Commission on the Status of Women condemning [alleged] Israeli oppression of women;
• "The enemy of human rights." Evidence: The resolution of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights condemning [alleged] Israeli violations of human rights; and
• "The enemy of peace." Evidence: The resolution of the UN General Assembly condemning Israel as "a non-peace-loving nation."

In a word, Israel was held out not only as the enemy of all that is good – workers' rights, health, culture, women, human rights, and peace – but the repository therefore of all that was evil. This was the forerunner of the ultimate in delegitimization today – the indictment of Israel as an apartheid and Nazi state, the embodiment of the two great evils of the 20th century.

As I wrote some 30 years ago, "In a world in which human rights has emerged as the new secular religion of our time" – something which I celebrated at the time – Israel was being held out as a meta-human rights violator, as the new anti-Christ of our time.

And so the question becomes: If delegitimization has always been with us, why is it only now that it has emerged as a byword and buzzword. What has changed? Is it simply a matter of plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose? How does this impact – not only in terms of what we think about human rights and Israel – but on how we act?

There is a cluster of dynamics that have underpinned this developing critical mass of delegitimization – or rather, the laundering of that delegitimization – and which provide context and content for this phenomenon:

First, globalization – not only of media and markets, of technology and trade – but the globalization of law, of human rights, of NGOs – of the constituents of the international legal revolution – of lawfare, in the best sense. But, at the same time, the obverse and darker side of this international legal revolution – of lawfare – underpinning delegitimization, also emerged as a global phenomenon.

Second, the reconfiguration of the Arab-Israeli conflict as the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. As my late colleague Justice Walter Tarnopolsky presciently put it back in 1976, "as long as the Arabs deny Israel's right to exist, they have no case and no standing to make their case. But if Israel denies the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination, they will be seen to have no case, and no standing to make the case."

Israeli MK Ahmad Tibi, right, joins in an anti-Israel demonstration in the Hague.

Third, the reframing of the narrative of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in human rights terms – the Palestinization of that narrative – with the emergence of the Palestinian cause held out as the prototypical human rights cause [as the Soviet Jewry cause had been.] The corollary, of course, was Israel's emergence as the antithesis of that cause, and of the cause of human rights generally.

Fourth, the mainstreaming of the human rights narrative – and the Palestinization of that narrative – amongst the elites: political, diplomatic, Parliamentary, media, NGOs, and intellectuals.

Fifth, the Boycott, Divestment, Sanctions movement as metaphor and message of delegitimization – the politicization of academe and the Palestinization of the campus culture – with the Palestinian cause becoming the poster child for the human rights cause, and Israel Apartheid Week as its manifestation.

Sixth, the end of the Cold War and the dénouement of the struggle for Soviet Jewry as the leitmotif of the human rights struggle in East-West terms, and which partook of the international legal revolution. It then morphed into the globalization of the struggle for human rights – the darker side of lawfare – and the subsequent delegitimization of Israel under the cover of the rule of law.

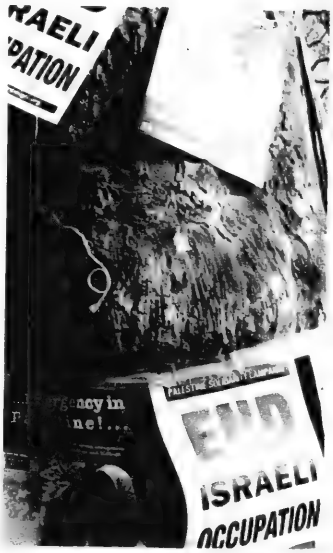
Finally, Durban I and its aftermath: The institutionalization of lawfare, the full-blown laundering of the delegitimization of Israel under the protective cover of the UN, the authority of international law, the imprimatur of human rights, the struggle against racism et al., with the battle cry of Durban now becoming the new thematic refrain: "If the struggle against racism in the 20th century required the dismantling of South Africa as an apartheid state, the struggle against racism in the 21st century requires the dismantling of Israel as an apartheid state."

As we have seen, the phenomenon of delegitimization – of lawfare – and the laundering of that delegitimization under all the 'good' rubrics – paralleled the emergence of the human rights and legal revolutions. What follows now are five case studies of the laundering of delegitimization under the 'good' – first, under the protective cover of the UN; second, under the cover of international law; third, under the cover of human rights; and, fourth, under the struggle against racism.



Anti-Israel signs in London

I: Delegitimization under the protective cover of the UN

The dramatic case study here is the annual ritual of condemnatory United Nations General Assembly resolutions, a process that will soon begin and run until the end of November, and where more resolutions are adopted against Israel than against the rest of the world combined. But what still passes under the radar screen – yet is very much part of the dynamic of delegitimization – is not simply the critical mass of resolutions adopted by the UN General Assembly, and by the UN specialized agencies; but that, at any given moment, somewhere, there is a UN agency, or UN resolution, or UN decision, or UN process, singling out Israel for differential or discriminatory treatment being initiated – and these UN meetings are attended not only by diplomats, but by Parliamentarians, jurists, academics, media, NGOs, church groups and the like. In a word, there is not only a critical mass of delegitimization under the protective cover of the UN, but a critical mass of exposure to that delegitimization.

More importantly, these resolutions read like legal judgments – findings of fact and conclusions of law – characterizing Israel therefore, as an international outlaw, systematically violating "the decent opinion of mankind", which the UN is held out to represent, and "the dictates of international conscience," which international human rights law is held out to be.

Accordingly, it should not be surprising that much of this international discourse focuses on the "illegality" of the settlements. For the United States, Canada, and Europe are legal cultures. If you say something is "illegal", it is much worse than saying it is ill-advised, ill-conceived, or bad policy, reminding me of the strategy of delegitimization as expressed to me some 35 years ago by Osama El-Baz, the then Egyptian eminence grise to Presidents Sadat and Mubarak, who said, "If Prime Minister Begin continues to say that if Israel has no right to Hevron, it has no right to Tel Aviv, then we will show the world that Israel has no right to Hevron, and the world will then realize that Israel has no right to Tel Aviv."

II: The laundering of delegitimization under the cover of international law

This is lawfare in all its manifest expressions and impact both positive and negative. Examples abound, and not just an essay, but a book could be written on this case study alone. Let me give but one example: The use and abuse of the principle of Universal Jurisdiction – an adjunct of the global legal revolution – which authorizes every State to prosecute alleged war criminals for the commission of war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide. Indeed, Israel itself was one of the first to invoke and exercise this principal in the prosecution of Adolf Eichmann, and is now commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Eichmann trial.

In other words, it is not Universal Jurisdiction per se that is the problem. Indeed, Israel's use could even be regarded as a positive application of the international legal revolution, or lawfare in the pursuit of justice.

Rather, what amounts to the abuse of lawfare is the selective and prejudicial use and application of the principle of universal jurisdiction through the singling out of Israeli nationals for systematic and discriminatory treatment. Indeed, this is not just prejudicial to Israel – and its right to self-defense and legitimacy in the international arena – but it undercuts the authority and legitimacy of international criminal law itself.

III: The laundering of delegitimization under the cover of human rights

The dramatic case study here is the singling out of Israel for differential and discriminatory treatment at the UN Human Rights Council which, like its predecessor, the UN Human Rights Commission, is regarded in the international human rights system as a repository of standard setting in international human rights law, and has the authority and sanctioning framework to bring human rights violators to account.

In the first 20 months alone of its operations, the UNHRC adopted 16 resolutions of condemnation. Yet, all 16 indicted only one member state of the international community – Israel. Not one resolution was adopted against any of the major human rights violators such as Sudan, Iran, Libya, Syria or China. They continued to enjoy exculpatory immunity, while Israel was denied international due process and equality before the law.

FORMER SOUTH AFRICAN PRESIDENT NELSON MANDELA ON ISRAELI APARTHEID:
"The UN took a strong stand against apartheid; and over the years, an international consensus was built, which helped to bring an end to this iniquitous system. But we know too well that our freedom is incomplete without the freedom of the Palestinians."
APARTHEID:
WRONG FOR SOUTH AFRICANS, WRONG FOR PALESTINIANS
END ISRAELI APARTHEID!

An anti-Israel demonstrator in Washington accuses Israel of being an apartheid state. (C.Devorah photo)

Indeed, a dramatic illustration of the prejudicial and discriminatory singling out of Israel – and of the institutionalization of delegitimization under the cover of human rights – is that the alleged human rights violations of Israel are a permanent agenda item at every meeting of the UNHRC – the only country so singled-out. In a word, and I witnessed this myself when attending a meeting of the UNHRC, agenda item 8 speaks of "human rights violations of Israel in the Occupied Palestinian Territories," while agenda item 9 speaks of human rights violations in the rest of the world.

IV: The laundering of delegitimization under the struggle against racism

The fourth case study is a particularly pernicious form of labelling. For the worst thing you can do in the world today is to label somebody as "racist." The very label supplies the indictment; no further debate is required; the conviction is secured – only the sentence needs to be determined. If saying that "Zionism is racism" 36 years ago gave, in Daniel Moynihan's words "the abomination of antisemitism the appearance of international legal sanction", how much more damming is the labelling of Israel as an apartheid state – particularly when apartheid has emerged as a metaphor for one of the two great evils of the 20th century – along with Nazism – and is defined in international law as a crime against humanity.

Let there be no mistake about it: to indict Israel as an apartheid state is prologue to, and justification for, the dismantling of the Jewish State, for the criminalization of its supporters, and for the consequential silencing of their speech.

Take back the narrative

For if Israel is an apartheid state – and apartheid is a crime against humanity – than Israel has no right to be, and its supporters are criminal accomplishes in that enterprise [thereby silencing their advocacy.] And if that is not enough, one slides inexorably into the indictment of Israel not only as an apartheid state, but as a Nazi state, making the dismantling of Israel not only hortatory, but mandatory - and all, as it were, in the name of the struggle against racism. What hypocrisy - what bigotry - what an abomination, as Moynihan would say.

Conclusion

The question now becomes: What needs to be done? I have written elsewhere of a 10 point strategy – but, for reasons of space, will confine myself to two points. First, it is essential – as a matter of strategy as well as objective – to take back the narrative, to move out of the docket of the accused into the docket of the plaintiff or claimant. The first initiative therefore should be to invert the present paradigm of delegitimization, which now, simply put, is as follows: The Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the source of all conflict in the Middle East and beyond; the occupation is the source of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict; and apartheid Israel is the root cause of both the occupation and the conflict – with Israel as an 'original sin' now dressed up in delegitimization discourse.

It must be made clear that radical Islam and the oppressive Arab tyrannies are the source of conflict in the Middle East and beyond; that the core of the Israeli-Palestinian-Arab conflict has been the unwillingness of radical Islam – and most of the Arab and Palestinian leadership – to recognize the legitimacy of a Jewish State – within any borders; that Iran and its proxies Hamas and Hezbollah constitute a clear and present danger not only to Israel, but to international peace and security; and that this is the real criminal apartheid – not only an unwillingness to accept the legitimacy of Israel, but to call publicly for its destruction.

Finally, it should be made clear that delegitimization – rather, the laundering of that delegitimization – is not only prejudicial to Israel and its supporters, but it undermines the integrity of the United Nations, under whose protective cover it proceeds. It erodes the authority of international law, under whose imprimatur it acts. It debases the struggle for human rights, under whose banner it marches. It shames the struggle against racism under whose mandate it proceeds. And so, delegitimization is not just a threat to Israel, it is a clear and present danger to peace, international security, human rights and the rule of law. It has turned the legal and human rights revolution – of lawfare in the best sense – on its head.

Lawrence of Judaea?

T.E. Lawrence – better known as Lawrence of Arabia - was a lifelong friend of Arab national aspirations. In 1917 and 1918 he participated as a British officer in the Arab revolt against the Turks, a revolt led by Sharif Hussein, later King of the Hedjaz. He was also an adviser to Hussein's son Feisal, whom he hoped to see on the throne of Syria. For generations of British Arabists, Lawrence was, and remains a symbol of British understanding of, and support for Arab national aspirations. Virtually unknown is his understanding of, and support for Jewish national aspirations, in the same era.

Sir Martin Gilbert

In mid-December 1918, a month after the end of World War I, Lawrence was instrumental in securing an agreement between Emir Feisal and the Zionist leader, Dr Chaim Weizmann. The meeting was held at the Carlton Hotel in London (a building subsequently destroyed in the London Blitz). At this meeting, Lawrence acted as the interpreter. Weizmann noted at the time that he had assured Feisal that the Zionists in Palestine should be able "to carry out public works of a far-reaching character" and that the country "could be so improved that it would have room for four or five million Jews, without encroaching on the ownership rights of Arab peasantry."

In reply, Feisal told Weizmann that "it was curious there should be friction between Jews and Arabs in Palestine. There was no friction in any other country where Jews lived together with Arabs... He did not think for a moment that there was any scarcity of land in Palestine. The population would always have enough, especially if the country were developed. Besides, there was plenty of land in his district."

On Jan. 3, 1919, Feisal and Weizmann met again in London, to sign an agreement between the King of the Hedjaz and the Zionists. Lawrence, who was once again the guiding hand in this agreement, hoped that it would ensure what he, Lawrence, termed "the lines of Arab and Zionist policy converging in the not distant future."

On March 1, 1919, Lawrence, while in Paris as the senior British representative with the Hedjaz Delegation, drafted and then wrote out in his own hand a letter from Feisal to the American Zionist Felix Frankfurter. In this letter, Feisal declared: "We Arabs, especially the educated among us, look with the deepest sympathy on the Zionist movement." Feisal went on to write that Weizmann "has been a great helper of our cause, and I hope the Arabs may soon be in a position to make the Jews some return for their kindness. We are working together for a reformed a revised Near East, and our two movements complete one another." The Jewish movement, Feisal wrote, "is national, and not imperialist: our movement is national and not imperialist, and there is room in Syria for us both. Indeed I think that neither can be a real success without the other."

Feisal added, in strong, optimistic words: "I look forward, and my people with me look forward to a future in which we will help you and you will help us, so that the countries in which we are mutually interested may once again take their place in the comity of the civilized peoples of the world."

Lawrence's support for Jewish national aspirations was not known to his contemporaries, and yet it was perhaps suspected. In early 1920, as Lawrence prepared his wartime experiences of the Arab Revolt for publication, he wrote to Rudyard Kipling to ask if Kipling would read the proofs of the book - Seven Pillars of Wisdom. Kipling replied that he would be glad to see the proofs, but that, if it emerged from them that Lawrence was 'pro-Yid', he would send the proofs back to him untouched.

Kipling was distressed at the thought that Lawrence might be pro-Jewish. Lawrence's view of the potential evolution of the Jewish National Home in British Mandate Palestine was certainly not hostile to Jewish hopes. In an article entitled 'The Changing East', published in the influential Round Table magazine in 1920, Lawrence wrote, of the Jewish experiment in Palestine, that it was "a conscious effort, on the part of the least European people in Europe, to make head against the drift of the ages, and return once more to the Orient from which they came."

Jewish success would 'raise Arab population'

Lawrence noted of the new Jewish immigrants: "The colonists will take back with them to the land which they occupied for some centuries before the Christian era samples of all the knowledge and technique of Europe. They propose to settle down amongst the existing Arabic-speaking population of the country, a people of kindred origin, but far different social condition. They hope to adjust their mode of life to the climate of Palestine, and by the exercise of their skill and capital to make it as highly organized as a European State."

As Lawrence envisaged it in his Round Table article, this would be done in a way that would be beneficial to the Arabs. "The success of their scheme," he wrote of the Zionists, "will involve inevitably the raising of the present Arab population to their own material level, only a little after themselves in point of time, and the consequences might be of the highest importance for the future of the Arab world. It might well prove a source of technical supply rendering them independent of industrial Europe, and in that case the new confederation might become a formidable element of world power."

It seemed to Lawrence - as it did to Winston Churchill when he discussed the question of eventual Jewish sovereignty with the Peel Commissioners in 1937, shortly after Lawrence's death - that it would take a long time before a Jewish majority would come into being. Such a contingency, Lawrence had written in his Round Table article, "will not be for the first or even for the second generation, but it must be borne in mind in any laying out of foundations of empire in Western Asia." These, to a very large extent, "must stand or fall by the course of the Zionist effort."

When Churchill became Colonial Secretary in January 1921, he appointed Lawrence to be his Arab Affairs Adviser. At the outset of his appointment, Lawrence held talks with Feisal about Britain's Balfour Declaration promise of a Jewish National Home in Palestine. Reporting on these talks to Churchill in a letter dated Jan. 17, 1921, Lawrence was able to assure the new Colonial Secretary – responsible for finalizing the terms of the Palestine Mandate – that in return for Arab sovereignty in Baghdad, Amman and Damascus, Feisal "agreed to abandon all claims of his father to Palestine."

This was welcome news for Churchill, but there was a problem. Since the French were already installed in Damascus, and were not willing to make way for Feisal or any Arab leader, Churchill proposed giving Feisal, instead of the throne of Syria, the throne of Iraq, and at the same time giving Feisal's brother Abdullah the throne of Transjordan - that part of Britain's Palestine Mandate lying to the east of the River Jordan.

Establishing an Arab ruler in Transjordan would enable Western Palestine – the area from the Mediterranean Sea to the River Jordan, an area that now comprises both Israel and the West Bank – to become the location of the Jewish National Home, under British control, in which, in Churchill's words, the Jews were to go "of right, and not on sufferance".

On March 17, 1921, at the Cairo Conference, briefed by Lawrence, Churchill explained to the senior officials gathered there that the presence of an Arab ruler under British control east of the Jordan would enable Britain to prevent anti-Zionist agitation from the Arab side of the river. In support of this view, Lawrence himself told the conference, as the secret minutes recorded: "He trusted that in four or five years, under the influence of a 'just policy' Arab opposition to Zionism would have decreased, if it had not entirely disappeared."

Lawrence went on to explain to the conference that "it would be preferable to use Trans-Jordania as a safety valve, by appointing a ruler on whom we could bring pressure to bear, to check anti-Zionism." The ideal ruler would be "a person who was not too powerful, and who was not an inhabitant of Trans-Jordania, but who relied upon His Majesty's Government for the retention of his office." That ruler, Lawrence believed, would best be Emir Abdullah, Feisal's brother.

The presence of Lawrence of Arabia at the Cairo Conference was of inestimable benefit to Churchill in his desire to help establish a Jewish National Home in Palestine. Lawrence's friendship with the Arab leaders, with whom he had fought during the Arab Revolt, and his knowledge of their weaknesses as well as their strengths, was paralleled by his understanding of Zionist aspirations. In November 1918, on the first anniversary of the Balfour Declaration, Lawrence had told a British Jewish newspaper: "Speaking entirely as a non-Jew, I look on the Jews as the natural importers of western leaven so necessary for countries of the Near East."

On March 27, 1921, ten days after Lawrence's suggestions in Cairo, Churchill sent him from Jerusalem to Transjordan, to explain to Abdullah that his authority would end at the eastern bank of the River Jordan, that the Jews were to be established in the lands between the Mediterranean and the Jordan ("Western Palestine"), and that he, Abdullah, must curb all anti-Zionist activity and agitation among his followers.

The next day, in Jerusalem, Lawrence, Churchill and Abdullah were photographed at British Government House: Churchill bundled up against the cold, Lawrence in a dark suit and tie, Abdullah in army uniform with Arab headdress. At their meeting that day, Abdullah agreed to limit the area of his control to Transjordan, and to refrain from any action against the Jewish National Home provisions of the Palestine Mandate west of the Jordan.

Lawrence had helped ensure that the building up of the Jewish National Home could continue. He already knew that National Home's potential. Twelve years before the Cairo Conference, while travelling through Galilee in the region of Tiberias, he reflected on the glory days of the region in Roman times, and on the Jewish farm settlements that he saw on his travels, writing home on August 2, 1909: "Galilee was the most Romanized province of Palestine. Also the country was well-peopled, and well watered artificially: There were not 20 miles of thistles behind Capernaum! And on the way round the lake they did not come upon dirty, dilapidated Bedouin tents, with the people calling to them to come in and talk, while miserable curs came snapping at their heels: Palestine was a decent country then, and could so easily be made so again. The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better: their colonies are bright spots in a desert."

Such was the opinion of no less than Lawrence of Arabia: "The sooner the Jews farm it all, the better…"

Sir Martin Gilbert spent the war years (1940-44) in Canada as a child evacuee, and was recently a visiting professor at the University of Western Ontario. He has lectured over the years in Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, London, Ont., Windsor, Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver and Victoria.

We've got it backwards:

The evidence is growing that we may be fighting the wrong battle in the struggle to support Israel these days.

The situation is grim, if not alarming: Jerusalem is increasingly on the defensive diplomatically, faced with a United Nations vote for a Palestinian state in September, and a range of outside efforts aimed at undermining the legitimacy of the Jewish State, from boycotts to flotillas. What's more, there is concern that the circle-the-wagon response in Jerusalem to these threats can lead to more problems; witness the recent passage of anti-boycott resolution in the Knesset that has been widely criticized as undemocratic, even among mainstream Jewish organizations.

True, Israel advocacy groups are proliferating, offering programs, websites and curriculum, many of them first-rate in presenting Jerusalem's case and countering critics. But at the same time the number of Americans who care about the Jewish State in a more than superficial way is decreasing.

Polls continue to indicate that Americans favour Israel over the Palestinians by wide margins. But the findings also suggest that most Americans would not be willing to have the United States involved with either side in the event of a Mideast war. Other surveys find increasing indifference on the topic.

There is a growing recognition among some American Jewish leaders that Israel advocacy is not enough because it provides answers to questions that most people aren't asking. We need a fresh and creative approach.

First, let me be clear. I am a believer in Israel advocacy and have seen its positive impact, particularly through Write On For Israel, the program sponsored by The Jewish Week with funding from the Avi Chai Foundation. Now in its ninth year, it continues to provide a select group of high school juniors and seniors with the Mideast facts and moral confidence to be effective supporters of Israel on campus. The program has a proven track record of success as our graduates have taken on leadership roles as freshmen and sophomores at colleges around the country.

But the foundation for effective advocacy is education, and there is far too little modern Israel education in our community. Even top day schools spend far more time focusing on ancient Jewish history than on the complex Mideast events of the 20th century that frame the current conflict.

Could it be that because of our long history as a people, the curriculum never quite makes it to modern times?

Gary Rosenblatt

Our children learn about the ancient Maccabees but couldn't tell you much, if anything, about key Zionist leaders like Ben-Gurion, Jabotinsky, Begin and Dayan. Even an authentic, living hero of the Jewish people like Natan Sharansky is little known, and the gap in our educational efforts is taking its toll.

John Ruskay, the executive vice president and CEO of UJA-Federation of New York, says the issue "requires urgent focus."

"We as a community need to renew Zionist education, an issue we've neglected, and we are seeing some of the results with younger people now," he recently told The Jewish Week. "We are not well served by conflating Israel advocacy and Israel education. Since 1948 we've asked people to rally for Israel, and they did. But we didn't provide the educational frameworks that would allow them to grapple with the challenge of developing their own vision of what Israel can and should be, and working through tough issues. For ultimately, such a process strengthens connection and commitment.

"Too many in our community," he added, "young and old, are intellectually naked when it comes to the complexity of contemporary Zionist education, and these include many of our future professional and lay leaders."

The results of the current focus on advocacy rather than education is that mainstream American Jewry is left uninformed and often uninterested when it comes to the complex and troublesome issue of Israel vs. much of the world.

Israel education should come first, then advocacy

And young people who receive an advocacy pitch without a solid grounding in Israel education are particularly prone to having their beliefs challenged and shaken.

As evidence, a study by the Melton Center for Jewish Education at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, found that presenting day school students with information on both sides of the Israel issue and letting them draw their own conclusions is more effective than shielding them from criticism or being perceived as forcing on them the "correct" response.

Most students were vague and uncomfortable when asked to define Zionism, and were reluctant to describe themselves as Zionists.

Rabbi Donniel Hartman, president of the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem, asserts that Israel advocacy programs "often fail to achieve their end.

"When the case for Israel is grounded only on a factual narrative," he wrote in an essay entitled "Engaging Israel: Beyond Advocacy," "it is often unconvincing to those who hold a counter factual perception. In general, positions are rarely formed purely around facts, but rather by ideological, moral and psychological propensities which then construct factual narratives to reinforce the preexisting commitment."

Rabbi Hartman argues that the majority of committed American Jews, and especially younger ones, "lack a language to understand or articulate their feelings about Israel" as well as a framework to combat delegitimization campaigns. He maintains that's because the standard arguments for supporting Israel – a safe haven in event of another Holocaust; the Jewish State is in danger; and Israel is a key ally in the war against evil empires – are irrelevant and no longer apply.

According to Rabbi Hartman (the son of the institute's founder, Rabbi David Hartman), American Jews feel safe in the United States, perceive Israel as more Goliath than David, and are not engaged by the notion of America going to war, again.

He has developed a curriculum for his institute offering a "new Israel engagement narrative" that is not crisis-centered but based mostly on "Jewish values" and the notion that Israel is "a work in progress," one welcoming Jews around the world to help shape.

It's a thoughtful, sophisticated approach and recognizes that talk about Israel must maintain standards of pluralism, tolerance and morality held dear by American Jews.

It's good to know that, in addition, other educational institutions are exploring their own ideas about how to present, teach and engage with Israel in ways that reflect the new realities, including a generation of American Jews less emotionally attached to Jerusalem than their parents and grandparents.

There is a recognition taking hold that people's views on Israel are not just about policies, like settlements, but about people and values and connecting on a personal level. There's no one magic approach that works for everyone, but it's clear that advocacy is best when it is grounded in education, and we need a lot more of it.

This idea of thinking of Israel in a new and meaningful way that brings us closer to understanding, appreciating and making real the Zionist dream is not a simple task. But it's critically important, now – for Israel and for us.

For the record: milestones in the quest for peace

Israeli soldiers are jubilant after the recapture of the Western Wall in 1967.

1947 - The United Nations recommends partition with the passage of Resolution 181 by a vote of 33 to 13 – with Canada supporting the division of the former British Mandate into Jewish and Arab states. The Jewish community in the region accepts the decision. Arab nations and Palestinians reject partition.

1948 - Israel declares independence on May 14 on the territory partitioned according to Resolution 181. The following day, six Arab states invade Israel.

1949 - War of Independence ends, with armistice lines being drawn between the two sides. Egypt assumes control of the Gaza Strip, while Jordan occupies the West Bank and the eastern side of Jerusalem.

1957 - After Egypt refuses to make peace, Israel withdraws independently from the Sinai Peninsula. United Nations peacekeepers are installed along the Israel-Egypt border.

June 5, 1967 - Six Day War begins: Following threats by surrounding Arab states, led by Egypt and Syria, to destroy Israel, the movement of Arab troops to Israel's borders and Egypt's blockade of the Straits of Tiran, Israel launches a pre-emptive airstrike against Egyptian airbases. Jordan's attack on Israel is repelled, and Jerusalem is reunified. As a result of a war of self-defence, Israel comes into possession of the Sinai and Gaza Strip from Egypt, the West Bank from Jordan, and the Golan Heights from Syria.

1973 - Yom Kippur War breaks out, with Egypt and Syria launching a surprise attack on Israel. Over 2,500 Israeli soldiers are killed.

1979 - Egypt and Israel sign a comprehensive peace agreement at Camp David. In exchange for Egypt's recognition and an end to hostilities, Israel withdraws from the entire Sinai Peninsula. In the process, Israel transfers a territory area three times the size of Israel, uprooting established Jewish communities and forfeiting energy self-sufficiency.

militants and Israel. Working with United Nations forces, Israel maintains military personnel inside the security zone until 2000.

Madrid Peace Conference establishes bilateral and multilateral frameworks. The PLO participates as part of Jordanian delegation. Talks do not prove productive.

1993 - Israel and the Palestinians extend mutual recognition and sign the first phase of the Oslo Agreements – setting out the framework for a comprehensive peace agreement to be phased in over a five-year period. Israel agrees to withdraw from areas of the disputed territories and pave the way for final-status negotiations. The Palestinians establish self-governing authority and agree to crack down on terrorism, end incitement, and accept Israel's right to exist. Hamas and other militant groups respond with a wave of suicide bombings on Israeli civilian targets, lasting throughout the Oslo process.

1994 - Israel and Jordan sign a peace agreement, overseeing co-operation on a wide range of border issues. As a part of the settlement, Israel transfers land in exchange for water rights in the region.

1997 - By this point, following implementation of Israeli withdrawal plans, 98 per cent of the Palestinian populace is now governed by the Palestinian Authority.

1998 - The Wye River Memorandum is released, clarifying outstanding issues and obligations. The document requires the Palestinians to do more in terms of ending incitement and shutting down terror groups, as conditions to be fulfilled prior to additional Israel withdrawals.

2000 - Israel independently withdraws all of its military personnel from south Lebanon.

At Camp David with the support of President Bill Clinton, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak offers Palestinian National Authority President Yasser Arafat full statehood. The proposal includes Israeli withdrawal from the entire Gaza Strip and 95 per cent of the West Bank, compensating land swaps, and shared sovereignty in Jerusalem. Arafat rejects the offer, refuses to make a counter-offer, and encourages Palestinians to respond with violence. The resulting wave of suicide bombings and attacks kill more than 1,000 Israelis and wound more than 8,000.

2003 - The "performance-based roadmap" to a permanent two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is presented by the Quartet – the UN, EU, Russia and the United States.

2004 - President George Bush's letter to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon assures Israel that, in light of Sharon's plan to withdraw from Gaza and parts of the West Bank, the United States will recognize "new realities on the ground, including already existing Israeli population centers" (i.e. settlement blocs around Jerusalem) that will become part of Israel in final status talks with the Palestinians. Bush writes that "it is unrealistic to expect that the outcome of final status negotiations will be a full and complete return to the armistice lines of 1949."

2005 - Israel independently withdraws from the Gaza Strip, removing all military forces as well as 8,500 Israeli civilians; also dismantles four settlements in the West Bank.

2006 - Hamas terrorists from Gaza invade Israel and ambush an Israeli border post, killing two Israeli soldiers and kidnapping another. The kidnapped soldier, Gilad Schalit, remains confined by Hamas to this day – with the group denying access to the International Red Cross.

Hezbollah operatives invade Israel and ambush an Israeli border patrol, killing eight soldiers and kidnapping two. The Second Lebanon War erupts, with Hezbollah firing thousands of missiles at cities and communities across northern Israel.

2007 - Hamas, a partner with Fatah in the Palestinian Authority's unity government, launches a violent coup in Gaza. Hamas quickly seizes control of the territory and leading Fatah figures are forced to flee to the West Bank with Israel's assistance.

Hamas and militant forces in Gaza continue to fire missiles at communities inside Israel. After a decade of such attacks (numbering in the thousands.) Israel launches Operation Cast Lead with the stated mission of ending the ongoing threat facing the people of southern Israel.

2009 - Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announces a temporary 10-month building freeze in all Jewish communities over the Green Line (1949 armistice lines.) Intended as a gesture to build trust and confidence, the move represents the first time an Israeli government has suspended all construction – even natural growth – in the region. Netanyahu calls on Abbas to meet immediately and without pre-condition, in order to negotiate the establishment of full peace and a Palestinian state. Abbas refuses to meet, and the two sides end up resorting to proximity talks through international parties.

2010 - President Barack Obama convenes the resumption of direct talks between Israeli and Palestinian negotiators, to take place in the first week of September in Washington, DC

UN Security Council Resolution 242 Nov. 22, 1967

Following the June '67, Six Day War, the situation in the Middle East was discussed by the UN General Assembly, which referred the issue to the Security Council. After lengthy discussion, a final draft for a Security Council resolution was presented by the British Ambassador, Lord Caradon, on Nov. 22, 1967. It was adopted on the same day.

This resolution, numbered 242, established provisions and principles which, it was hoped, would lead to a solution of the conflict. Resolution 242 was to become the cornerstone of Middle East diplomatic efforts in the coming decades.

The Security Council,

Expressing its continuing concern with the grave situation in the Middle East,

Emphasizing the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by war and the need to work for a just and lasting peace in which every State in the area can live in security,

Emphasizing further that all Member States in their acceptance of the Charter of the United Nations have undertaken a commitment to act in accordance with Article 2 of the Charter,

1. Affirms that the fulfillment of Charter principles requires the establishment of a just and lasting peace in the Middle East which should include the application of both the following principles:

• Withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict;

• Termination of all claims or states of belligerency and respect for and acknowledgement of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of every State in the area and their right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries free from threats or acts of force;

2. Affirms further the necessity

• For guaranteeing freedom of navigation through international waterways in the area;

• For achieving a just settlement of the refugee problem;

• For guaranteeing the territorial inviolability and political independence of every State in the area, through measures including the establishment of demilitarized zones;

3. Requests the Secretary General to designate a Special Representative to proceed to the Middle East to establish and maintain contacts with the States concerned in order to promote agreement and assist efforts to achieve a peaceful and accepted settlement in accordance with the provisions and principles in this resolution;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on the progress of the efforts of the Special Representative as soon as possible.

UN security Council resolution 338 Oct. 22, 1973

In the later stages of the Yom Kippur War -- after Israel repulsed the Syrian attack on the Golan Heights and established a bridgehead on the Egyptian side of the Suez Canal -- international efforts to stop the fighting were intensified. US Secretary of State Henry Kissinger flew to Moscow on Oct. 20, and, together with the Soviet Government, the US proposed a cease-fire resolution in the UN Security Council. The Council met on Oct. 21 at the urgent request of both the US and the USSR, and by 14 votes to none, adopted the following resolution:

The Security Council,

1. Calls upon all parties to present fighting to cease all firing and terminate all military activity immediately, no later than 12 hours after the moment of the adoption of this decision, in the positions after the moment of the adoption of this decision, in the positions they now occupy;

2. Calls upon all parties concerned to start immediately after the cease-fire the implementation of Security Council Resolution 242 (1967) in all of its parts;

3. Decides that, immediately and concurrently with the cease-fire, negotiations start between the parties concerned under appropriate auspices aimed at establishing a just and durable peace in the Middle East.

Letters between Israel's PM Yitzhak Rabin and the PLO's Yasser Arafat

Inaugurates Oslo Process, which began with the signing of the Declaration of Principles on Sept. 13, 1993.

September 9, 1993

Yitzhak Rabin
Prime Minister of Israel
Mr. Prime Minister,

The signing of the Declaration of Principles marks a new era in the history of the Middle East. In firm conviction thereof, I would like to confirm the following PLO commitments:

The PLO recognizes the right of the State of Israel to exist in peace and security.

The PLO accepts United Nations Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338.

The PLO commits itself to the Middle East peace process, and to a peaceful resolution of the conflict between the two sides and declares that all outstanding issues relating to permanent status will be resolved through negotiations.

The PLO considers that the signing of the Declaration of Principles constitutes a historic event, inaugurating a new epoch of peaceful coexistence, free from violence and all other acts which endanger peace and stability. Accordingly, the PLO renounces the use of terrorism and other acts of violence and will assume responsibility over all PLO elements and personnel in order to assure their compliance, prevent violations and discipline violators.

In view of the promise of a new era and the signing of the Declaration of Principles and based on Palestinian acceptance of Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, the PLO affirms that those articles of the Palestinian Covenant which deny Israel's right to exist, and the provisions of the Covenant which are inconsistent with the commitments of this letter are now inoperative and no longer valid. Consequently, the PLO undertakes to submit to the Palestinian National Council for formal approval the necessary changes in regard to the Palestinian Covenant.

PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat and Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. [IGPO]

Sincerely,

Yasser Arafat
Chairman
The Palestine Liberation Organization

September 9, 1993

Yasser Arafat
Chairman
The Palestinian Liberation Organization

Mr. Chairman,

In response to your letter of September 9, 1993, I wish to confirm to you that, in light of the PLO commitments included in your letter, the Government of Israel has decided to recognize the PLO as the representative of the Palestinian people and commence negotiations with the PLO within the Middle East peace process.

White Paper responsible for misery

On April 2, 1947, the British government informed the secretary general of the United Nations of its intention to place the question of the future government of Palestine on the agenda of the next regular session of the General Assembly. It asked that a special session should be convened to constitute and instruct a special committee to make recommendations on the future government of Palestine. Israel's future prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, addressed the General Assembly, when it convened the following month.

First of all, I should like to try to clarify further the nature of the problem which the Mandatory power has placed before the United Nations as this is essential for defining properly the terms of reference of the special committee. Last Friday, the representative of the United Kingdom, on behalf of his government, declared that it had tried for years to settle the problem of Palestine and had failed. It has, therefore, brought the problem to you in the hope that the United Nations would find a just solution.

This statement is open to misunderstanding. The Mandatory power was not charged with discovering a solution to the Palestine problem and its failure was not in its inability to find the right solution. The Mandatory power was charged by the League of Nations with the carrying out of a definite settlement. That settlement was set out and determined originally by the United Kingdom itself and subsequently confirmed by all the Allies and associated Powers in the first world war, as well, as by the Arabs through Amir Faisal and the Syrian Arab Committee. It was later embodied in the mandate, approved by 52 nations and made international law.

The terms of that settlement as decreed by the conscience and the law of nations are common knowledge. It is the restoration of Palestine to the Jewish people.

At the time the United Kingdom took over the mandate, the problem of Palestine had been clearly adjudicated and settled. The failure of the mandatory government, as admitted by the British representative, was a failure to carry out the settlement agreed upon and entrusted to it by the nations of the world. That failure became manifest with the introduction of a policy, set forth in the White Paper of 1939, which violated the most essential terms of the mandate and vitiated its entire purpose.

The White Paper policy, as you know, was condemned by the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations as incompatible with the mandate and with the pledges repeatedly given by the mandatory government itself. It was also denounced by the most eminent political leaders of the United Kingdom itself, including all the prominent members of the present government of the United Kingdom, as a breach of faith. Only recently, the White Paper was again unanimously condemned by the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry.

The White Paper policy is responsible for the misery and deaths of a large number of Jews and for cruel acts of expulsion of Jewish refugees. It is responsible for establishing in Palestine a police State without parallel in the civilized world. It is responsible for the introduction in Palestine of racial discrimination against Jews in land legislation. This is the real nature of the failure of the Mandatory power.

Therefore, I venture to suggest that the first problem facing the United Nations is how to set right that failure and to ensure that international obligations toward the Jewish population in Palestine are faithfully fulfilled.

The second point to which I should like to invite the attention of your Committee is the fact that in Palestine you are faced not merely with a large and growing number of Jews, but with a distinct Jewish nation. There are Jews and Jewish communities in many countries, but in Palestine there is a new and unique phenomenon - a Jewish nation, with all the attributes, characteristic resources and aspirations of nationhood. This nationhood springs from a long history and an uninterrupted connection, for 3,500 years, with its ancestral soil.

Palestine, which, for the Jewish people, has always been and will always remain the land of Israel, was in the course of centuries conquered and invaded by many alien peoples, but none of them ever identified its national faith with Palestine. The Jewish nation in Palestine is rooted not only in past history but in a great living work of reconstruction and rebuilding, both of a country and of a people.

The growth of this nation and its work of reconstruction must not and cannot be arrested - and this, for two reasons. One is the existence of large numbers of homeless Jews for whom there is no other salvation in the future except in their own national home. The second is that more than two-thirds of the land in Palestine is still wasteland, uncultivated, unsettled, and believed by the Arabs to be uncultivatable. The history of our settlement in the last seventy years has shown that this land can be and is being cultivated by us. This is not because we are more skilled or more capable than others, but because this is the only soil in the world which we call our own. We are not, like our Arab neighbours, in possession of vast under-populated territories, like Iraq, Syria, Arabia, etc. We must therefore make use of every bit of free land in our country, even desert land.

No conflict with Arab people

Another observation is this. We are told that the Arabs are not responsible for the persecution of the Jews in Europe, nor is it their obligation to relieve their plight. I wish to make it quite clear that it never entered our minds to charge the Arabs with solving the Jewish problem, or to ask Arab countries to accept Jewish refugees. We are bringing our homeless and persecuted Jews to our own country and settling them in Jewish towns and villages. There are Arab towns and villages in Palestine - Nablus, Jenin, Ramleh, Zarnuka, Lydda, Tarshiha. You will not find a single Jewish refugee in any of them. The Jews who have returned to their country are settled in Petah Tiqva, Rishon le Zion, Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem, Deganiya, the region of the Negev, and other Jewish towns and villages built by us.

The return of the Jews to their country is a work of self-liberation and self-reconstruction, which is contributing to the reconstruction and liberation of the country as a whole.

My fourth, and last, remark is this. We have no conflict with the Arab people. On the contrary, it is our deep conviction that, historically, the interests and aspirations of the Jewish and Arab peoples are compatible and complementary. What we are doing in our country, in Palestine, is reclaiming the land, increasing the yield of the soil, developing modern agriculture and industry, science, and art, raising the dignity of labour, ensuring women's status of equality, increasing men's mastery over nature and working out a new civilization based on human equality, freedom and co-operation in a world which we believe is as necessary and beneficial for our Arab neighbours as for ourselves.

A Jewish-Arab partnership, based on equality and mutual assistance, will help to bring about the regeneration of the entire Middle East. We Jews understand and deeply sympathize with the urge of the Arab people for unity, independence, and progress, and our Arab neighbours, I hope, will realize that the Jews in their own historic homeland can under no conditions be made to remain a subordinate, dependent minority as they are in all other countries in the Diaspora. The Jewish nation in its own country must become a free and independent State with a membership in the United Nations. It is eager to co-operate with its free Arab neighbours to promote economic development, social progress, and real independence of all the Semitic countries in the Middle East.

Mr. Chairman, I most earnestly suggest to your Committee that the real, just, and lasting solution of the problem before you is a Jewish State and a Jewish-Arab alliance.

Jerusalem and the holy places

On Dec. 5, 1949, then-Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion spoke before the Knesset of the fate of Jerusalem and its meaning to Israel. The following is an excerpt from that speech:

As you know, the United Nations is currently discussing the issue of Jerusalem and the holy places. The State of Israel is a member of the UN, not because of political convenience but because of its traditional, deep-seated commitment to the vision of world peace and the brotherhood of nations, as preached by our prophets and accepted by the UN

This membership obliges us, from the podium of Israel's First Knesset, to tell all the nations assembled at the UN and all those who love peace and justice in the world what has been in Israel's heart since it became a united nation under King David three thousand years ago as regards Jerusalem its holy city and as regards its attitude to the places which are holy to the other religions.

When we proclaimed the establishment of the renewed State of Israel, on May 14, 1948, we declared that, "The State of Israel will guarantee freedom of religion and conscience, of language, education and culture. It will safeguard the Holy Places of all religions. It will be loyal to the principles of the United Nations Charter." Accordingly, our delegation to the UN announced that Israel would honor all the existing rights regarding the holy places and sacred buildings in Jerusalem, assure freedom of worship and free access...to all the holy sites under its control, recognizing the rights of pilgrims of all religions and nations to visit their holy places and assuring freedom of movement for clergymen. We agreed to allow effective UN supervision of the holy places and the existing rights.

At the same time we see fit to state that Jewish Jerusalem is an organic, inseparable part of the State of Israel, just as it is an integral part of Jewish history and belief... Jerusalem is the heart of the State of Israel. We are proud of the fact that Jerusalem is also sacred to other religions, and will gladly provide access to their holy places and enable them to worship as and where they please, cooperating with the UN to guarantee this.

We cannot imagine, however, that the UN would attempt to sever Jerusalem from the State of Israel or harm Israel's sovereignty in its eternal capital.

Twice in the history of our nation were we driven out of Jerusalem, only after being defeated in bitter wars by the larger, stronger forces of Babylon and Rome. Our links with Jerusalem today are no less deep than in the days of Nebuchadnezzar and Titus Flavius, and when Jerusalem was attacked after the fourteenth of May 1948, our valiant youngsters risked their lives for our sacred capital no less than our forefathers did in the time of the First and Second Temples.

...A nation which, for 2,500 years, has faithfully adhered to the vow made by the first exiles by the waters of Babylon not to forget Jerusalem, will never agree to be separated from Jerusalem. Jewish Jerusalem will never accept alien rule after thousands of its youngsters liberated their historic homeland for the third time, redeeming Jerusalem from destruction and vandalism.

We do not judge the UN, which did nothing when nations that were members of the UN declared war on its resolution of November 29, 1947, trying to prevent the establishment of Israel by force, to annihilate the Jewish population in the Holy Land and destroy Jerusalem, the holy city of the Jewish people.

Had we not been able to withstand the aggressors who rebelled against the UN, Jewish Jerusalem would have been wiped off the face of the earth, the Jewish population would have been eradicated and the State of Israel would not have arisen. Thus, we are no longer morally bound by the UN resolution of November 29, since the UN was unable to implement it....

The attempt to sever Jewish Jerusalem from the State of Israel will not advance the cause of peace in the Middle East or in Jerusalem itself. Israelis will give their lives to hold on to Jerusalem, just as the British would for London, the Russians for Moscow and the Americans for Washington.

This is the first time in this country's history that the state controlling Jerusalem willingly accepts the principle of the international supervision of the holy places. It is no coincidence that it is being done by the nation which made Jerusalem an internationally sacred centre and by the first government elected by the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

We hope that the religions which honour Jerusalem's sanctity and the nations which share our belief in the principles of peace and justice will honour Israel's rights in Jerusalem, just as Israel honours those of all the religions in its sacred capital and sovereign state.

No right to return

Letter to the Editor of the Jerusalem Post, August 19, 1989 by Abba Eban

Sir, - There is a persistent discussion in the media and in speeches by Palestinian spokesmen about what is called a "right of return."

This point should not need much discussion for the simple reason that no such "right" exists. The very term "right of return" has never featured in an internationally binding document. Insofar as Israel is concerned, its status is governed by Resolution 273 (III) of the General Assembly (May 11, 1949) dealing with admission to the United Nations and "taking note of the declarations and explanations of the representative of the Government of Israel before the ad hoc Political Committee of the General Assembly." This is the only occasion on which the admission of a state has been related to speeches by an applicant. In those "declarations and explanations," I made it clear that the admission of refugees was a matter for Israel's sovereign discretion and was not subject to legal constraints.

Membership in the United Nations is based on the principle of the "sovereign equality of all its members." This means that Israel's control of entry to its territory is equivalent to that of the United States, the USSR, Egypt or any of the other 150 and more member states.

In December 1948, the General Assembly of the United Nations made a recommendation about the return of refugees, but this was described as a matter subject to "permission," not as a matter of "right." Moreover, on February 24, 1947, the permanent members of the Security Council determined that a General Assembly resolution does not create international obligations. All the Arab states concurred in this finding.

The conclusion is that entry into Israel is something that individuals or groups outside Israel have a right to request and that Israel has a sovereign right to accept or reject.

What I have written here applies to all territories in which Israeli law and jurisdiction are or will be in force.

Abba Eban
Herzliya

The resolution against Zionism

The following is an excerpt from the address given by Israeli ambassador to the United Nations Chaim Herzog to the General Assembly of the United Nations on Nov. 10, 1975:

Mr. President,

It is symbolic that this debate, which may well prove to be a turning point in the fortunes of the United Nations and a decisive factor in the possible continued existence of this organization, should take place on November 10. Tonight, 37 years ago, has gone down in history as Kristallnacht, the Night of the Crystals. This was the night in 1938 when Hitler's Nazi storm-troopers launched a coordinated attack on the Jewish community in Germany, burned the synagogues in all its cities and made bonfires in the streets of the Holy Books and the scrolls of the Holy Law and Bible. It was the night when Jewish homes were attacked and heads of families taken away, many of them never to return. It was the night when the windows of all Jewish businesses and stores were smashed, covering the streets in the cities of Germany with a film of broken glass which dissolved into the millions of crystals which gave that night its name. It was the night which led eventually to the crematoria and the gas chambers, Auschwitz, Birkenau, Dachau, Buchenwald, Theresienstadt and others. It was the night which led to the most terrifying holocaust in the history of man.

It is indeed befitting Mr. President, that this debate, conceived in the desire to deflect the Middle East from its moves towards peace and born of a deep pervading feeling of anti-Semitism, should take place on the anniversary of this day. It is indeed befitting, Mr. President, that the United Nations, which began its life as an anti-Nazi alliance, should 30 years later find itself on its way to becoming the world center of anti-Semitism. Hitler would have felt at home on a number of occasions during the past year, listening to the proceedings in this forum, and above all to the proceedings during the debate on Zionism.

It is sobering to consider to what level this body has been dragged down if we are obliged today to contemplate an attack on Zionism. For this attack constitutes not only an anti-Israeli attack of the foulest type, but also an assault in the United Nations on Judaism - one of the oldest established religions in the world, a religion which has given the world the human values of the Bible, and from which two other great religions; Christianity and Islam, sprang. Is it not tragic to consider that we here at this meeting in the year 1975 are contemplating what is a scurrilous attack on a great and established religion which has given to the world the Bible with its Ten Commandments, the great prophets of old, Moses, Isaiah, Amos; the great thinkers of history, Maimonides, Spinoza, Marx, Einstein, many of the masters of the arts and as high a percentage of the Nobel Prize winners in the world, in the sciences, in the arts and in the humanities as has been achieved by any people on earth? . . .

The resolution against Zionism was originally one condemning racism and colonialism, a subject on which we could have achieved consensus, a consensus which is of great importance to all of us and to our African colleagues in particular. However, instead of permitting this to happen, a group of countries, drunk with the feeling of power inherent in the automatic majority and without regard to the importance of achieving a consensus on this issue, railroaded the UN in a contemptuous maneuver by the use of the automatic majority into bracketing Zionism with the subject under discussion.

I do not come to this rostrum to defend the moral and historical values of the Jewish people. They do not need to be defended. They speak for themselves. They have given to mankind much of what is great and eternal. They have done for the spirit of man more than can readily be appreciated by a forum such as this one.

Chaim Herzog, Israeli ambassador to United Nations

I come here to denounce the two great evils which menace society in general and a society of nations in particular. These two evils are hatred and ignorance. These two evils are the motivating force behind the proponents of this resolution and their supporters. These two evils characterize those who would drag this world organization, the ideals of which were first conceived by the prophets of Israel, to the depths to which it has been dragged today.

The key to understanding Zionism is in its name. The easternmost of the two hills of ancient Jerusalem during the 10th century B.C.E. was called Zion. In fact, the name Zion, referring to Jerusalem, appears 152 times in the Old Testament. The name is overwhelmingly a poetic and prophetic designation. The religious and emotional qualities of the name arise from the importance of Jerusalem as the Royal City and the City of the Temple. "Mount Zion" is the place where God dwells. Jerusalem, or Zion, is a place where the Lord is King, and where He has installed His king, David.

King David made Jerusalem the capital of Israel almost 3,000 years ago, and Jerusalem has remained the capital ever since. During the centuries the term "Zion" grew and expanded to mean the whole of Israel. The Israelites in exile could not forget Zion. The Hebrew Psalmist sat by the waters of Babylon and swore: "If I forget three, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning." This oath has been repeated for thousands of years by Jews throughout the world. It is an oath which was made over 700 years before the advent of Christianity and over 1,200 years before the advent of Islam, and Zion came to mean the Jewish homeland, symbolic of Judaism, of Jewish national aspirations.

Jews of Yemen make their way to the newly created State of Israel, joining the cause of the national liberation of the Jewish people.

While praying to his God every Jew, wherever he is in the world, faces towards Jerusalem. For over 2,000 years of exile these prayers have expressed the yearning of the Jewish people to return to their ancient homeland, Israel. In fact, a continuous Jewish presence, in larger or smaller numbers, has been maintained in the country over the centuries.

Zionism is the name of the national movement of the Jewish people and is the modern expression of the ancient Jewish heritage. The Zionist ideal, as set out in the Bible, has been, and is, an integral part of the Jewish religion.

Zionism is to the Jewish people what the liberation movements of Africa and Asia have been to their own people.

Zionism is one of the most dynamic and vibrant national movements in human history. Historically it is based on a unique and unbroken connection, extending some 4,000 years, between the People of the Book and the Land of the Bible.

In modern times, in the late 19th century, spurred by the twin forces of antisemitic persecution and of nationalism, the Jewish people organized the Zionist movement in order to transform their dream into reality. Zionism as a political movement was the revolt of an oppressed nation against the depredation and wicked discrimination and oppression of the countries in which antisemitism flourished. It is no coincidence that the co-sponsors and supporters of this resolution include countries who are guilty of the horrible crimes of antisemitism and discrimination to this very day.

Support for the aim of Zionism was written into the League of Nations Mandate for Palestine and was again endorsed by the United Nations in 1947, when the General Assembly voted by overwhelming majority for the restoration of Jewish independence in our ancient land.

The re-establishment of Jewish independence in Israel, after centuries of struggle to overcome foreign conquest and exile, is a vindication of the fundamental concepts of the equality of nations and of self-determination. To question the Jewish people's right to national existence and freedom is not only to deny to the Jewish people the right accorded to every other people on this globe, but it is also to deny the central precepts of the United Nations.

As a former foreign minister of Israel, Abba Eban, has written:

"Zionism is nothing more - but also nothing less - than the Jewish people's sense of origin and destination in the land linked eternally with its name. It is also the instrument whereby the Jewish nation seeks an authentic fulfillment of itself. And the drama is enacted in 20 states comprising a 100 million people in 4 1/2 million square miles, with vast resources. The issue therefore is not whether the world will come to terms with Arab nationalism. The question is at what point Arab nationalism, with its prodigious glut of advantage, wealth and opportunity, will come to terms with the modest but equal rights of another Middle Eastern nation to pursue its life in security and peace."

The vicious diatribes on Zionism voiced here by Arab delegates may give this Assembly the wrong impression that while the rest of the world supported the Jewish national liberation movement the Arab world was always hostile to Zionism. This is not the case. Arab leaders, cognizant of the rights of the Jewish people, fully endorsed the virtues of Zionism. Sherif Hussein, the leader of the Arab world during World War I, welcomed the return of the Jews to Palestine. His son, Emir Feisal, who represented the Arab world in the Paris Peace Conference, had this to say about Zionism:

"We Arabs, especially the educated among us, look with deepest sympathy on the Zionist movement.... We will wish the Jews a hearty welcome home.... We are working together for a reformed and revised Near East, and our two movements complement one another. The movement is national and not imperialistic. There is room in Syria for us both. Indeed, I think that neither can be a success without the other."

It is perhaps pertinent at this point to recall that when the question of Palestine was being debated in the United Nations in 1947, the Soviet Union strongly supported the Jewish independence struggle. It is particularly relevant to recall some of Andrei Gromydo's remarks:

"As we know, the aspirations of a considerable part of the Jewish people are linked with the problem of Palestine and of its future administration. This fact scarcely requires proof.... During the last war, the Jewish people underwent exceptional sorrow and suffering. Without any exaggeration, this sorrow and suffering are indescribable. It is difficult to express them in dry statistics on the Jewish victims of the fascist aggressors. The Jews in the territories where the Hitlerites held sway were subjected to almost complete physical annihilation. The total number of Jews who perished at the hands of the Nazi executioners is estimated at approximately six million....

"The fact that no Western European State has been able to ensure the defense of the elementary rights of the Jewish people and to safeguard it against the violence of the fascist executioners explains the aspirations of the Jews to establish their own State. It would be unjust not to take this into consideration and to deny the right of the Jewish people to realize this aspiration."

Great moments in Jewish history

How sad it is to see here a group of nations, many of whom have but recently freed themselves of colonial rule, deriding one of the most noble liberation movements of this century, a movement which not only gave an example of encouragement and determination to the peoples struggling for independence but also actively aided many of them either during the period of preparation for their independence or immediately thereafter.

As I stand on this rostrum, the long and proud history of my people unravels itself before my inward eye. I see the oppressors of our people over the ages as they pass one another in evil procession into oblivion. I stand here before you as the representative of a strong and flourishing people which has survived them all and which will survive this shameful exhibition and the proponents of this resolution.

The great moments of Jewish history come to mind as I face you, once again outnumbered and the would-be victim of hate, ignorance and evil. I look back on those great moments. I recall the greatness of a nation which I have the honor to represent in this forum. I am mindful at this moment of the Jewish people throughout the world wherever they may be, be it in freedom or in slavery, whose prayers and thoughts are with me at this moment.

I stand here not as a supplicant. Vote as your moral conscience dictates to you. For the issue is neither Israel nor Zionism. The issue is the continued existence of this organization, which has been dragged to its lowest point of discredit by a coalition of despots and racists.

The vote of each delegation will record in history its country's stand on antisemitic racism and anti-Judaism. You yourselves bear the responsibility for your stand before history, for as such will you be viewed in history. We, the Jewish people, will not forget.

For us, the Jewish people, this is but a passing episode in a rich and event-filled history. We put our trust in our Providence, in our faith and beliefs, in our time-hallowed tradition, in our striving for social advance and human values, and in our people wherever they may be. For us, the Jewish people, this resolution based on hatred, falsehood and arrogance, is devoid of any moral or legal value.

Here you have a movement which is the embodiment of a unique pioneering spirit, of the dignity of labour, and of enduring human values, a movement which has presented to the world an example of social equality and open democracy being associated in this resolution with abhorrent political concepts.

We in Israel have endeavored to create a society that strives to implement the highest ideals of society - political, social and cultural - for all the inhabitants of Israel, irrespective of religious belief, race or sex.

Sabotaging peace efforts

Show me another pluralistic society in this world in which despite all the difficult problems, Jew and Arab live together with such a degree of harmony, in which the dignity and rights of man are observed before the law, in which no death sentence is applied, in which freedom of speech, of movement, of thought, of expression are guaranteed, in which even movements which are opposed to our national aims are represented in our Parliament.

The Arab delegates talk of racism. What has happened to the 800,000 Jews who lived for over two thousand years in the Arab lands, who formed some of the most ancient communities long before the advent of Islam. Where are they now?

The Jews were once one of the important communities in the countries of the Middle East, the leaders of thought, of commerce, of medical science. Where are they in Arab society today? You dare talk of racism when I can point with pride to the Arab ministers who have served in my government; to the Arab deputy speaker of my Parliament; to Arab officers and men serving of their own volition in our border and police defense forces, frequently commanding Jewish troops; to the hundreds of thousands of Arabs from all over the Middle East crowding the cities of Israel every year; to the thousands of Arabs from all over the Middle East coming for medical treatment to Israel; to the peaceful coexistence which has developed; to the fact that Arabic is an official language in Israel on a par with Hebrew; to the fact that it is as natural for an Arab to serve in public office in Israel as it is incongruous to think of a Jew serving in any public office in an Arab country, indeed being admitted to many of them. Is that racism? It is not! That, Mr. President, is Zionism.

Zionism is our attempt to build a society, imperfect though it may be, in which the visions of the prophets of Israel will be realized. I know that we have problems. I know that many disagree with our government's policies. Many in Israel too disagree from time to time with the government's policies ... and are free to do so because Zionism has created the first and only real democratic state in a part of the world that never really knew democracy and freedom of speech.

This malicious resolution, designed to divert us from its true purpose, is part of a dangerous antisemitic idiom that is being insinuated into every public debate by those who have sworn to block the current move towards accommodation and ultimately towards peace in the Middle East. This, together with similar moves, is designed to sabotage the efforts of the Geneva Conference for peace in the Middle East and to deflect those who are moving along the road towards peace from their purpose. But they will not succeed, for I can but reiterate my government's policy to make every move in the direction towards peace, based on compromise.

We are seeing here today but another manifestation of the bitter antisemitic, anti-Jewish hatred which animates Arab society. Who would have believed that in this year, 1975, the malicious falsehoods of the "elders of Zion" would be distributed officially by Arab governments? Who would have believed that we would today contemplate an Arab society which teaches the vilest anti-Jewish hate in the kindergartens?... We are being attacked by a society that is motivated by the most extreme form of racism known in the world today. This is the racism which was expressed so succinctly in the words of the leader of the PLO, Yassir Arafat, in his opening address at a symposium in Tripoli, Libya: "There will be no presence in the region other than the Arab presence...." In other words, in the Middle East from the Atlantic Ocean to the Persian Gulf only one presence is allowed, and that is Arab presence. No other people, regardless of how deep are its roots in the region, is to be permitted to enjoy its right to self-determination.

Look at the tragic fate of the Kurds of Iraq. Look what happened to the black population in southern Sudan. Look at the dire peril in which an entire community of Christians finds itself in Lebanon. Look at the avowed policy of the PLO, which calls in its Palestine Covenant of 1964 for the destruction of the State of Israel, which denies any form of compromise on the Palestine issue and which, in the words of its representative only the other day in this building, considers Tel Aviv to be occupied territory. Look at all this, and you see before you the root cause of the twin evils of this world at work, the blind hatred of the Arab proponents of this resolution, and the abysmal ignorance and wickedness of those who support them.

The issue before this Assembly is neither Israel nor Zionism. The issue is the fate of this organization. Conceived in the spirit of the prophets of Israel, born out of an anti-Nazi alliance after the tragedy of World War II, it has degenerated into a forum which was this last week described by [Paul Johnson] one of the leading writers in a foremost organ of social and liberal thought in the West as "rapidly becoming one of the most corrupt and corrupting creations in the whole history of human institutions ... almost without exception those in the majority came from states notable for racist oppression of every conceivable hue." He goes on to explain the phenomenon of this debate:

"Israel is a social democracy, the nearest approach to a free socialist state in the world; its people and government have a profound respect for human life, so passionate indeed that, despite every conceivable provocation, they have refused for a quarter of a century to execute a single captured terrorist. They also have an ancient but vigorous culture, and a flourishing technology. The combination of national qualities they have assembled in their brief existence as a state is a perpetual and embittering reproach to most of the new countries whose representatives swagger about the UN building. So Israel is envied and hated; and efforts are made to destroy her. The extermination of the Israelis has long been the prime objective of the Terrorist International; they calculate that if they can break Israel, then all the rest of civilization is vulnerable to their assaults....

"The melancholy truth, I fear, is that the candles of civilization are burning low. The world is increasingly governed not so much by capitalism, or communism, or social democracy, or even tribal barbarism, as by a false lexicon of political clichés, accumulated over half a century and now assuming a kind of degenerate sacerdotal authority.... We all know what they are...."

Over the centuries it has fallen to the lot of my people to be the testing agent of human decency, the touchstone of civilization, the crucible in which enduring human values are to be tested. A nation's level of humanity could invariably be judged by its behavior towards its Jewish population. Persecution and oppression have often enough begun with the Jews, but it has never ended with them. The anti-Jewish pogroms in Czarist Russia were but the tip of the iceberg which revealed the inherent rottenness of a regime that was soon to disappear in the storm of revolution. The anti-Semitic excesses of the Nazis merely foreshadowed the catastrophe which was to befall mankind in Europe....

On the issue before us, the world has divided itself into good and bad, decent and evil, human and debased. We, the Jewish people, will recall in history our gratitude to those nations who stood up and were counted and who refused to support this wicked proposition. I know that this episode will have strengthened the forces of freedom and decency in this world and will have fortified the free world in their resolve to strengthen the ideals they so cherish. I know that this episode will have strengthened Zionism as it has weakened the United Nations.

As I stand on this rostrum, the long and proud history of my people unravels itself before my inward eye. I see the oppressors of our people over the ages as they pass one another in evil procession into oblivion. I stand here before you as the representative of a strong and flourishing people which has survived them all and which will survive this shameful exhibition and the proponents of this resolution.

The great moments of Jewish history come to mind as I face you, once again outnumbered and the would-be victim of hate, ignorance and evil. I look back on those great moments. 'Peace will require courage'

Following are excerpts from an address by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu at Bar-Ilan University, June 14, 2009.

I turn to our Palestinian neighbours, led by the Palestinian Authority, and I say: Let's begin negotiations immediately without preconditions.

Israel is obligated by its international commitments and expects all parties to keep their commitments. We want to live with you in peace, as good neighbours. We want our children and your children to never again experience war: that parents, brothers and sisters will never again know the agony of losing loved ones in battle; that our children will be able to dream of a better future and realize that dream, and that together we will invest our energies in ploughshares and pruning hooks, not swords and spears...

If we join hands and work together for peace, there is no limit to the development and prosperity we can achieve for our two peoples – in the economy, agriculture, trade, tourism and education –most importantly, in providing our youth a better world in which to live, a life full of tranquillity, creativity, opportunity and hope.

If the advantages of peace are so evident, we must ask ourselves why peace remains so remote, even as our hand remains outstretched to peace? Why has this conflict continued for more than 60 years?

In order to bring an end to the conflict, we must give an honest and forthright answer to the question: What is the root of the conflict?...

The simple truth is that the root of the conflict was, and remains, the refusal to recognize the right of the Jewish people to a state of their own, in their historic homeland.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu delivered this policy address at the BESA Center at Bar-Ilan University.

In 1947, when the United Nations proposed the partition plan of a Jewish state and an Arab state, the entire Arab world rejected the resolution. The Jewish community, by contrast, welcomed it by dancing and rejoicing. The Arabs rejected any Jewish state, in any borders.

Those who think that the continued enmity toward Israel is a product of our presence in Judea, Samaria and Gaza, is confusing cause and consequence. The attacks against us began in the 1920s, escalated into a comprehensive attack in 1948 with the declaration of Israel's independence, continued with the fedayeen attacks in the 1950s, and climaxed in 1967, on the eve of the Six Day War, in an attempt to tighten a noose around the neck of the State of Israel. All this occurred during the 50 years before a single Israeli soldier ever set foot in Judea and Samaria...

Many good people have told us that withdrawal from territories is the key to peace with the Palestinians. Well, we withdrew. But the fact is that every withdrawal was met with massive waves of terror, by suicide bombers and thousands of missiles.

We tried to withdraw with an agreement and without an agreement. We tried a partial withdrawal and a full withdrawal. In 2000 and again last year, Israel proposed an almost total withdrawal in exchange for an end to the conflict, and twice our offers were rejected. We evacuated every last inch of the Gaza Strip, we uprooted tens of settlements and evicted Israelis from their homes, and in response, we received a hail of missiles on our cities, towns and children.

The claim that territorial withdrawals will bring peace with the Palestinians, or at least advance peace, has up till now not stood the test of reality. In addition to this, Hamas in the south, like Hezbollah in the north, repeatedly proclaims their commitment to "liberate" the Israeli cities of Ashkelon, Be'er Sheva, Acre and Haifa.

Territorial withdrawals have not lessened the hatred, and to our regret, Palestinian moderates are not yet ready to say the simple words: "Israel is the nation state of the Jewish people, and it will stay that way."

Achieving peace will require courage and candor from both sides, and not only from the Israeli side. The Palestinian leadership must arise and say: "Enough of this conflict. We recognize the right of the Jewish people to a state of their own in this land, and we are prepared to live beside you in true peace."

I am yearning for that moment, for when Palestinian leaders say those words to our people and to their people, then a path will be opened to resolving all the problems between our peoples, no matter how complex they may be. Therefore, a fundamental prerequisite for ending the conflict is a public, binding and unequivocal Palestinian recognition of Israel as the nation state of the Jewish people. To vest this declaration with practical meaning, there must also be a clear understanding that the Palestinian refugee problem will be resolved outside Israel's borders. For it is clear that any demand for resettling Palestinian refugees within Israel undermines Israel's continued existence as the state of the Jewish people.

The Palestinian refugee problem must be solved, and it can be solved, as we ourselves proved in a similar situation. Tiny Israel successfully absorbed hundreds of thousands of Jewish refugees who left their homes and belongings in Arab countries. Therefore, justice and logic demand that the Palestinian refugee problem be solved outside Israel's borders. On this point, there is a broad national consensus. I believe that with goodwill and international investment, this humanitarian problem can be permanently resolved...

We do not want to rule over [the Palestinian community], we do not want to govern their lives, we do not want to impose either our flag or our culture on them.

In my vision of peace, in this small land of ours, two peoples live freely, side by side, in amity and mutual respect. Each will have its own flag, its own national anthem, its own government. Neither will threaten the security or survival of the other. These two realities – our connection to the Land of Israel and the Palestinian population living within it –have created deep divisions in Israeli society. But the truth is that we have much more that unites us than divides us.

I have come tonight to give expression to that unity, and to the principles of peace and security on which there is broad agreement within Israeli society. These are the principles that guide our policy. This policy must take into account the international situation that has recently developed. We must recognize this reality and at the same time stand firmly on those principles essential for Israel.

I have already stressed the first principle – recognition. Palestinians must clearly and unambiguously recognize Israel as the state of the Jewish people.

The second principle is: demilitarization. The territory under Palestinian control must be demilitarized with iron-clad security provisions for Israel. Without these two conditions, there is a real danger that an armed Palestinian state would emerge that would become another terrorist base against the Jewish state, such as the one in Gaza. We don't want Qassam rockets on Petach Tikva, Grad rockets on Tel Aviv or missiles on Ben-Gurion Airport. We want peace.

In order to achieve peace, we must ensure that Palestinians will not be able to import missiles into their territory, to field an army, to close their airspace to us, or to make pacts with the likes of Hezbollah and Iran. On this point as well, there is wide consensus within Israel. It is impossible to expect us to agree in advance to the principle of a Palestinian state without assurances that this state will be demilitarized. On a matter so critical to the existence of Israel, we must first have our security needs addressed.

Therefore, today we ask our friends in the international community, led by the United States, for what is critical to the security of Israel: clear commitments that in a future peace agreement, the territory controlled by the Palestinians will be demilitarized: namely, without an army, without control of its airspace and with effective security measures to prevent weapons smuggling into the territory – real monitoring, and not what occurs in Gaza today. And obviously, the Palestinians will not be able to forge military pacts. Without this, sooner or later, these territories will become another Hamastan. And that we cannot accept…

If we receive this guarantee regarding demilitarization and Israel's security needs, and if the Palestinians recognize Israel as the state of the Jewish people, then we will be ready in a future peace agreement to reach a solution where a demilitarized Palestinian state exists alongside the Jewish state.

Regarding the remaining important issues that will be discussed as part of the final settlement, my positions are known: Israel needs defensible borders, and Jerusalem must remain the united capital of Israel with continued religious freedom for all faiths. The territorial question will be discussed as part of the final peace agreement…

I believe that a strong Palestinian economy will strengthen peace. If the Palestinians turn toward peace – in fighting terror, in strengthening governance and the rule of law, in educating their children for peace and in stopping incitement against Israel – we will do our part in making every effort to facilitate freedom of movement and access, and to enable them to develop their economy. All of this will help us advance a peace treaty between us.

Above all else, the Palestinians must decide between the path of peace and the path of Hamas. The Palestinian Authority will have to establish the rule of law in Gaza and overcome Hamas. Israel will not sit at the negotiating table with terrorists who seek their destruction. Hamas will not even allow the Red Cross to visit our kidnapped soldier Gilad Schalit, who has spent three years in captivity, cut off from his parents, his family and his people. We are committed to bringing him home, healthy and safe.

With a Palestinian leadership committed to peace, with the active participation of the Arab world, and the support of the United States and the international community, there is no reason why we cannot achieve a breakthrough to peace…

I call on the leaders of the Arab world and on the Palestinian leadership, let us continue together on the path of Menahem Begin and Anwar Sadat, Yitzhak Rabin and King Hussein. Let us realize the vision of the prophet Isaiah, who in Jerusalem 2,700 years ago said: "Nations shall not lift up sword against nation, and they shall learn war no more."

With God's help, we will know no more war. We will know peace.

Masada is a symbol of Jewish steadfastness

Feature

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff reporter

Wittily philosophizing about "tropical climes" at "certain times of the day," British playwright/composer/singer Noel Coward memorably wrote that only "mad dogs and Englishman go out in the midday sun."

Coward's amusing lyrics came to mind recently as I began walking up the steep, winding Snake Path toward the summit of Masada, the ancient Jewish rebel fortress conquered by a Roman army in 74 CE.

The trek up the Snake Path, rediscovered by Israeli archeologists in 1953, is recommended only for the physically fit. But on broiling summer days, when the temperature can easily reach at least 40 degrees celsius, intrepid walkers are cautioned to start their climb up to the 450-metre high rocky plateau early in the morning, before the weather becomes unbearably hot.

Since our group of Canadian journalists arrived at the eastern base of Masada long past this recommended hour, we were strongly advised to take the cable car. Five of us, flaunting the sound advice of our experienced guide, made for the Snake Path, which is entirely exposed to the burning sun of the Judean Desert.

The narrow trail was composed of loose rock and 700 rudimentary steps configured in a series of switchbacks. As I ascended, occasionally pausing to rest and drink water, I took in wonderful panoramic views of desiccated grey hills, the shimmering Dead Sea and the brooding Moab Mountains in neighbouring Jordan.

I made it to the summit in 45 minutes – my colleagues close behind – drenched in perspiration despite the super dry heat. After a brief break, I was ready to tour Masada, which I had last seen about two decades ago.

I was eager to revisit such attractions as the northern palace, the bathhouse and the breaching point, all of which have been extensively renovated.

Masada, one of the most important archeological sites in Israel, and a United Nations World Heritage site, was built by a Hasmonean monarch, Herod, a Judean king during the Second Temple period, fortified Masada and added a palatial winter palace and cisterns.

When the Jews of Judea – a Roman province – rose up in rebellion against their imperial masters in 66 CE, Roman legions descended upon the dissenters. The Galilee was subjugated, and in 70 CE the Temple in Jerusalem was destroyed, with the victorious Romans carting its treasures back to Rome.

Jewish rebels under the leadership of Eleazer Ben Yair fled to Masada, whose remote location and natural defences initially favoured the Jews.

The Roman siege of Masada, the final act in the Roman conquest of Judea, lasted a few months. The Tenth Roman Legion, commanded by Flavius Silva and consisting of some 8,000 troops, prepared for the anticipated battle by building eight camps, a siege wall, an earthen ramp and a battering ram.

Realizing that the Romans would prevail, Ben Yair convinced 960 of his fellow Jews that death was better than surrender and enslavement. As he put it, "Let our wives die before they are abused, and our children before they have tasted slavery... We have preferred death to slavery."

All but several of its inhabitants committed suicide rather than fall into the hands of the Romans. The survivors, two women and five children who had hidden in cisterns during the final days of the siege, told their story to Josephus, a former Jewish commander in the Galilee who had accommodated himself to Roman rule.

Josephus wrote about Masada in The Wars of the Jews, the only account on the historic siege.

When the Tenth Roman Legion left Masada, it remained uninhabited for a few hundred years until Christians built a monastery there during the Byzantine era. With the rise of Islam in the seventh century, the building fell into disuse, becoming a flyblown relic of a murky past.

Today the fortress is a beacon of freedom

During the 19th century, British adventurers explored Masada and a succession of European archeologists studied it.

The Hebrew translation of The Wars of the Jews in the 1920s heightened interest about Masada in the Yishuv, the Jewish community of Palestine. The Zionist narrative regarded Masada as a symbol of Jewish courage and steadfastness in the face of overwhelming odds.

From 1963 to 1965, the Israeli ex-general, archeologist and future politician Yigael Yadin carried our major excavations at Masada. Yadin uncovered the skeletal remains of 28 people. He also found many buildings and thousands of artifacts, which provided scholars with a much clearer picture of life during the Second Temple epoch. Further excavations were undertaken by Ehud Netzer in 1989 and 1995.

Masada National Park was opened in 1966 and the first cable car was put into service in 1971, increasing tourist traffic. Until the advent of the cable car, the Snake Path in the east and the less challenging Ramp Path in the west were the only ways of accessing the wonders of Masada.

Shortly after reaching Masada via the Snake Path, I stopped at the refurbished ruins of the northern palace, Masada's showpiece. Incorporating Hellenistic and Roman architectural elements, it is built on three rock terraces overlooking the Dead Sea and supported by sturdy retaining walls. The palace contains private rooms, a patio and bathhouses whose walls are adorned with remarkably preserved frescoes.

The biggest structure on the grounds, the western palace, was built around a courtyard containing living rooms and reception rooms – some of which are decorated with colorful mosaics – and bathing facilities.

Constructed during Herod's time, the synagogue was converted into a house of worship during the revolt against the Romans. Archeologists working here stumbled upon sacred scrolls, suggesting that parts of the shul could have been a geniza, a repository for all manner of documents.

The outlines of both the Roman siege wall and the camps, from which the assault was launched, are still visible. They supposedly form the most complete surviving Roman siege system in the world.

The cisterns, which could hold 40,000 cubic metres of water, were dry on the day of my visit. But the rugged landscape adjacent to them was awesome.

Masada, the last Jewish bastion to succumb to the Romans, is filled to the brim with a profusion of such splendid sights.

Masada was once a place of despair, but today it is a beacon of freedom.

Visiting Galizia

Janet Kerekes
Special to The CJN

Speaking to Avraham Ya'acov after Shabbat lunch, I mentioned my planned visit to Warsaw.

"Warsaw!?" he exclaimed.

"There are no Jews in Warsaw."

To which I replied "I was told there are no Jews in L'viv," as we sat in a L'viv shul, at the time.

We had a big laugh over this, but this story illustrates just how profoundly isolated Jewish communities everywhere are from each other.

Feature

L'viv, Lvov, or Lemberg, this historic center of Galizia, a lovely city of 800,000, was the destination for untold thousands of Jews fleeing Russian persecution during the 19th century. After having earned the dubious stamp of "Galizianer," many then emigrated; they are the forebears of much of today's North American Jewry.

My intense five day visit to L'viv was guided by Meylakh Sheykhet. A marvelous man of dedication and determination, he arranged for an interpreter, driver, expert advisor, and warm-hearted company so that I could see and learn as much as possible of present-day Galizian Jewish life. He is the leader of one of the two remaining communities in L'viv. The shul is a former coach entrance, which once led to the courtyard of the legendary Di Goldene Royz Synagogue, also known as TaZ. Built in the 1580s, it was preceded by another synagogue adjacent to it, attesting to 700 years of Jewish presence, activity, and prosperity in this city. It was burned down by the Nazis in 1942, leaving it in ruins. This juxtaposition is a constant reminder to the Jewish community as they arrive for services.

The Pidhaytsi Synagogue

We set out to see the synagogues, or what is left of them, in the Galizian countryside. Tarnopol, Chortkiv, Pidhaytsi and Berezhany, each a former centre of Jewish presence, learning and life. The relatively young synagogue in Tarnopol seems fine enough from the outside, but it was "repurposed" after the war; no longer a synagogue in the operative sense, it is used for occasional secular cultural events. It is the same case with the Fridmann Synagogue of Chortkiv, a late 19th century building of a local chassidic sect that is now a dance school. But the historic, beautiful synagogue from the 1700s, only a few blocks away, which protects passersby from its crumbling edifice by a strong fence, is still claimed by the Jewish community. Inside, it is filled with junk and currently being used by the adjacent medical college for storage, although quite open to the elements. The unique frescoes on the walls are hidden behind dirt and detritus. It is a wonder that the arches and walls have not collapsed yet. But they will soon, unless something is done about it. The community numbers only 50 souls, a couple of whom we met with, but they are resolute, and desire to fend off the inevitable and transform the synagogue into a Jewish historical museum.

The imposing Pidhaytsi Synagogue, from the 1620s, is in a similar state. The building is still standing, some paintings on the walls are still visible, and at least there is a roof that protects it to some extent. A non-Jewish official of the municipality is striving to preserve the building in order to establish it as a Jewish historical museum. He is also looking out for the nearby cemetery - the only one to date that has been restored in the region - as are some elderly shepherdesses, along with their goats and cows.

The last stop of the day was Berezhany. The synagogue there was rebuilt on its medieval foundations in the 1880s, but so poorly that it has literally fallen apart. There are no Jews in this town to worry about its condition and no will to do anything about it.

In contrast, the next day of our trip provided us with a lovely experience in the renaissance city of Zhovkva. The city's superintendent of historic preservation himself showed us the synagogue. A truly dedicated man, but suffering from a lack of funds and policies sympathetic to his projects, he is nonetheless trying to revive the so-called Fortress Synagogue as one of the significant heritage structures of his town. For Jews, however, it stands as a witness not only to the fundamental role they played in the founding and development of this former gem of a city, but also to the unspeakably painful loss of yet another once-thriving Jewish community.

It was thus only in L'viv where we found a sizeable Jewish community, currently numbering about 1,700. Perhaps 35 people gathered in that former coach entrance, now a very modest prayer room, for Erev Shabbat services the evening I attended. It also doubles as a dining room, where dinner was served; mostly vegetables, as kosher meat is imported, and thus very expensive. Shabbat arrives late in this region; we didn't finish dinner until 10:45. What could not be overlooked was the several women who discreetly took out plastic containers from their purses and put a portion of their dinner in them. The next evening I noticed a charming elderly gentleman doing the same thing. For the same reason that one averts one's gaze when we see actions that we are not meant to be privy to, I was reluctant to inquire why these people were doing this. But ask I did, and received the following answer: some of them had family members too old or incapacitated to attend – and others were, well, poor.

In the first four days I heard no mention of antisemitism. The Jewish presence here, as stated universally by non-Jewish Ukrainians, is an integral part of the Ukrainian heritage. When it comes to the Holocaust, everyone has a story to tell about how someone they knew hid Jews, and that those who were found out were severely punished by the Nazis. But on the fifth day, in lowered tones, a 62-year-old Jewish woman told me that antisemitism was everywhere. Confronting Meylach about this singular opposing view, he replied, "Of course."

The Jewish residents of L'viv desire contact with other Jews, to be less isolated. They would like people to come and teach Hebrew and Jewish studies. They need financial support, help with their medical and food needs. In these communities, there is stoicism, for having nothing, as it was for Holocaust survivors after the war. Sixty-six years after the Holocaust, 21 years after the fall of communism, it should not be this way. For such a minimalist way of living – we should be embarrassed. The Synagogue Project is an attempt to reach out and connect these Jews with ourselves. Synagogue to synagogue, for the synagogue is the venue for Jewish life in Central and Eastern Europe. For more information, please contact director@synagogueproject.org.

A tour of the tunnel

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff reporter

Feature

The Western Wall, the last known remnant of the Second Temple, destroyed by the Romans in 70 CE, is one of the holiest Jewish sites in Israel.

By day or by night, Jews by the hundreds pray at the cobblestone plaza abutting the weathered limestone wall, tucking notes into its crevices in the hope that their fondest wishes may be granted.

The open air portion of the wall, about 60 metres long, constitutes but a small proportion of it.

Much of the wall, which is actually more than 400 metres in length, lies six metres beneath the teeming Muslim quarter in eastern Jerusalem, captured by Israel in the 1967 Six Day War.

The Western Wall Tunnel, which has been fully opened to the public since 1996, permits visitors to explore the wall's subterranean segment.

Inside the Western Wall Tunnel

A tour of the tunnel – which connects the Western Wall prayer area to the northwest side of the Temple Mount, a religious compound important both to Judaism and Islam – has been compared to travelling back to the Second Temple epoch in a time machine.

This tumultuous era incorporates the Hasmonean period, the rule of Herod the Great and the Roman destruction of Jerusalem.

In the depths, a visitor casts eyes on massive walls and intimidating columns, the remains of a once buzzing thoroughfare, plaza and market, plus a mikvah, cistern and reservoir.

Who would have known?

Before Roman legions sacked Jerusalem, King Herod launched a construction project to double the size of the Temple Mount by building four retaining walls. As it happened, they survived the sacking of Jerusalem.

Over the centuries, the area was covered by debris and new buildings, consigning the hidden part of the Western Wall to oblivion.

Jewish scholars never quite figured out what its precise dimensions were. They had to wait until the last third of the 19th century to find out

Two British researchers, Charles Wilson and Charles Warren, discovered sections of the present-day tunnel. But their work was hampered by the Ottoman authorities.

Shortly after the Six Day War, the Israeli government began technically challenging excavations to expose the Western Wall in its entirety.

The work took two decades to complete.

When the northern exit of the Western Wall Tunnel was officially inaugurated, Arab riots erupted, causing the deaths of 15 Israeli soldiers and 60 Palestinians and casting a pall on the Oslo peace process.

The Palestinian Authority, then headed by Yasser Arafat, darkly claimed that the tunnel would undermine the foundations of the nearby Temple Mount.

No such thing has happened.

Fifteen years on, the divisive politics of the Arab-Israeli conflict seem far removed from the tunnel, one of Jerusalem's major tourist attractions.

The guided tour, which is usually by appointment, lasts approximately an hour. Visitors pass a scale model of the Second Temple before descending deeper into the relatively well lit tunnel.

I was warned that people prone to claustrophobia, like myself, should avoid the tunnel. The foot path through it was indeed narrow at times, but I never felt the queasy sensation of walls closing in.

If anything, the tunnel tour provides a new perspective on the Western Wall, Jerusalem and ancient Jewish history.

Three for the price of one.

We saw the marks of history at Entebbe

Rachele Joseph
Special to The CJN

Feature

The old terminal's air traffic control tower slowly came into view and I felt a surge of excitement as we drove into the realm of history. The tower is abandoned now, but remains standing as a symbol: a symbol of the heroism and strength of a united people. Over the years, my husband, Neil, and I have enjoyed every place our travels have taken us and Africa is no exception. After an incredible two and a half months on the continent, we found ourselves flying out from Entebbe International Airport in Uganda. In every continent, every country, and every city we have travelled to, history presents itself. But in Entebbe, it smacked us in the face at full force.

In a game of word association, Entebbe International Airport quickly conjures the memory of Operation Thunderbolt, or better known as 'the raid on Entebbe.' In 1976, many people spent days glued to their television sets during the terrifying week between June 27 and July 4, when over a hundred hostages were held for a week in the old airport terminal in Entebbe. Air France Flight 139, originating in Tel Aviv, was hijacked between Athens and Paris by the PFLP (Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine), the second largest group under the umbrella organization of the PLO (Palestinian Liberation Organisation.) A German terrorist group called Baader-Meinhof (Revolutionary Cells) partnered with the PFLP in this attack. This hijacking was one of many that took place in the 1970s and '80s and was a mode of terrorism that was actually pioneered by the PFLP. The Air France plane was given permission to land in Uganda, by then Dictator Idi Amin, and the terrorists were granted asylum while they held 106 hostages at gunpoint.

Although all non-Jewish passengers were given permission to leave, the captain and crew of the flight refused their freedom and remained with the Jewish passengers as demands were made for the release of 53 Palestinian terrorists; 40 from Israeli prisons and 13 from other prisons around the world.

Most of my generation and those younger than I know the heroic story through our parents, grandparents, and the many movies that portray the Israeli Defence Forces (IDF's) valiant rescue operation. But Neil and I were determined to see the marks of history for ourselves. The new terminal building, which services all commercial flights nowadays, is located mere minutes from where history unfolded and as we approached it, we felt the hunger for a bigger piece of this historical pie. As the old terminal is used solely for diplomatic arrivals and departures, we were uncertain if we would be granted the opportunity for a tour in the restricted area. Thankfully, the head of security was very accommodating to our request and, even though we had only two short hours to spare before our flight, he quickly arranged the paperwork, payment, and escorted transportation for us. Within minutes, we were past security clearance and driving down the tarmac towards the historical building.

Our security escorts were wonderful guides and retold the epic story of the rescue operation as we drove between terminals. Hearing the story retold proudly by these two gentlemen somehow made this act of terror feel more real to me. I quietly wondered how it had felt for them in 1979 when Ugandans broke free from Idi Amin's reign of terror and finally reclaimed their freedom. They mentioned that although the old air traffic control tower is completely abandoned and unserviceable, it will not be torn down.

It remains as a tribute to the significant events that took place. In fact, no modifications have been made to the building whatsoever and every bullet hole is still present and visible on the walls. They also mentioned that the tower is earmarked for a museum commemorating Operation Thunderbolt.

July 4, 1976 Entebbe Airport

On this date, an Israeli military force rescued more than 100 hostages held here at gunpoint. In a daring rescue mission, four military planes carrying Israeli commandos landed at midnight after an eight hour flight from Israel. Within minutes, the commandos stormed the old terminal, fighting both the terrorists and soldiers acting under the orders of the brutal dictator Idi Amin, and freed the hostages.

During the brief battle, the commander of the rescue force at the old terminal, Lt. Col Jonathan Netanyahu, lost his life, as did three of the hostages - Jean Jacques Maimoni, Ida Borovits and Pasco Cohen. A fourth hostage, Dora Bloch - who was recuperating at a hospital in Kampala - was brutally executed the following day on the orders of Amin.

The mission was renamed by Israel's government "Operation Jonathan", in honor of the brave commander who lost his life. The rescue at Entebbe will always remain a shining example of the fight against terrorism and a symbol of man's courage in resisting brutality and evil.

As we rounded the last turn, they pointed out the very spot where Lieutenant Colonel Yonatan "Yoni" Netanyahu, commander of the Special Operations unit of the IDF and brother of Prime Minister Benjamin "Bibi" Netanyahu, was shot and killed in action during the raid. Operation Thunderbolt, later renamed Operation Yonatan in his honour, commenced after a week of failed negotiations for the release of the hostages.

The surprise raid on the Entebbe Airport took place in the middle of the night on July 4, 1976 with aid from the Kenyan government. The IDF commandos were flown over 4,000 kilometers from Israel to Uganda, where they successfully took control of the terminal, killed the terrorists, and freed 102 hostages. The entire operation took only 90 minutes and, in the aftermath, Israel received great support from the Western world for their success. A memorial plaque, hopefully the first step in the creation of a future museum, is located on the building's exterior. It honours Yonatan Netanyahu as well as Jean Jaques Maimoni, Ida Borovits, and Pasco Cohen; three hostages who were killed, sadly, in the crossfire during the raid and Dora Bloch, a hostage who was released to a hospital during the week but murdered the day following the raid on the orders of Idi Amin.

I find it important to also note that many other innocent people were killed in these horrible events, including hospital staff who tried to prevent the murder of Dora Bloch and hundreds of Kenyans living in Uganda in response to Kenya's assistance in the raid.

During our tour, Neil and I were escorted through the building all the way up to the top of the air traffic control tower. I looked down at the tarmac from above and imagined Israeli military approaching and being fired upon by Ugandan military, under the orders of Idi Amin. This gunfire killed Yonatan Netanyahu. Evidence of the Israeli bullets that returned fire, blasting through the strong steel railings surrounding the tower's deck, still remains. As we walked through the many hallways, rooms, and floors of the old terminal building, I imagined over a hundred people sitting, cowering; waiting in fear.

Feeling and almost reliving history is something that cannot be described with mere words. My heart goes out to those who suffered and to the families of those that perished. My pride swells for the soldiers who risked their lives and the country that cares so much for its people. Walking back through the building, we noticed that the interior walls were covered in the usual graffiti of an abandoned building. But among the needless and meaningless scrawls, there were a few that caught our attention. Stars of David and Hebrew writing became evident as tributes of fellow visitors memorialising the events of that day. Before we left, Neil grabbed a small black stone from the ground, scrawled our tribute to the fight against terrorism, and forever incorporated our experience as an ingredient of this history's pie.

Remembering forever.

Rescuers remembered

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Feature

The simple plaques engraved with the names of the rescuers in Hebrew and English, are scattered around the grounds of Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority.

As I wandered around the Garden of the Righteous Among the Nations and the Avenue of the Righteous Among the Nations, dedicated spaces that have been allocated to commemorating the decent, courageous souls who risked their lives and that of their families to save Jews during the Holocaust, I randomly stopped at three of the plaques.

Honouring Varian Fry, Lucyna Pelikan and her son, Zbigniew, and Petronela and Wladyslaw Ziolo, they are among the 23,788 people, mainly European Christians from 45 countries, whose selfless deeds have not gone unnoticed.

Fry, the first American to be designated as a gentile rescuer, was a newspaperman who witnessed Nazi abuse against Jews in Berlin in the 1930s. Disturbed by what he had seen, he began working for the Emergency Rescue Committee. Based in Marseille, France, it is credited with saving more than 2,200 Jewish refugees, including the filmmaker Max Ophuls, the painter Marc Chagall and the philosopher Hannah Arendt.

The Pelikans, Polish Catholics from Warsaw, rescued Nina Einhorn, a Jewish woman who escaped from the sealed ghetto. At first, they charged her for room and board. But after they became friends, they let Einhorn live in their apartment for free. Einhorn lived with the Pelikans for over a year, until the 1944 Warsaw uprising. After the war, she moved to Sweden.

The Ziolos, Polish Christian farmers from the outskirts of Sandomierz, saved the life of a Jewish toddler named Joe Gottdenker, the current vice chairman of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

Yad Vashem was established in 1953, but a decade elapsed before it got around to paying recognition to rescuers like Fry, the Pelikans and the Ziolos and forming a commission charged with honouring righteous gentiles.

"There was a need to remember the good people," said Irena Steinfeldt, the director of Yad Vashem's Righteous Among the Nations department and the co-editor of The Holocaust and the Christian World. "It helped survivors find meaning in the darkness of the Holocaust."

The task of the commission which was staffed by survivors and initially headed by a Supreme Court justice who presided at the 1961 war crimes trial of Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann – was to determine criteria for naming rescuers.

To the commission, a rescuer was defined as a person who rendered sustained assistance without the expectation of financial gain, except for normal expenses incurred, and who did not try to convert a Jew.

Rescuers came from all walks of life, social classes and age groups, Steinfeldt said.

They may have been illiterate peasants, university professors, sewer workers, lawyers, circus performers, zoo directors or soccer players.

Typically, rescuers extended four kinds of assistance to Jews. They hid them in their homes or on their property. They provided them with false identities and documents. They smuggled them out of ghettos and prisons and helped them cross borders into safe havens. They rescued children given away by their Jewish parents in desperation.

Designating a rescuer is sometimes a dicey proposition, Steinfeldt noted .

"Oskar Schindler saved Jews, but he was a card-carrying Nazi party member who went to Poland to make money."

Plaques that honour rescuers

Due to his problematic background and motives, he was initially rejected for membership in this exclusive club.

"If the motivation was exclusively payment, we do not recognize a person as a Righteous Among the Nations. But a rescuer would not be penalized if he accepted money to buy food for the person under his protection."

Citing another possible conflict of interest, Steinfeldt mentioned the touchy issue of conversion.

If a Jewish child was converted to Christianity, no recognition is possible. But if a conversion was performed to protect a child from persecution or death, recognition is acceptable. Steinfeldt proceeded to tell the story of a Jewish women, now a resident of Tel Aviv, who is so grateful to her rescuer that still wears a crucifix today.

Program will continue as long as names received

Steinfeldt, whose job it is to decide who may qualify as a Righteous Among the Nations, said that some nominees will probably never be chosen.

Chabad-Lubavitch, for example, has nominated Wilhelm Canaris, the director of German military intelligence from 1935 to 1944. Secretly an anti-Nazi who attempted to topple Adolf Hitler in a series of plots but who was executed as a traitor, Canaris may have played a role in the rescue of the Lubavitch rebbe in wartime Warsaw.

Irena Steinfeldt

According to Steinfeldt, Canaris is not likely to be nominated. "This is not a very strong case," she explained. "I don't know if his resume will ever be submitted."

To date, Yad Vashem has designated more than 400 Germans as Righteous Among the Nations. Apart from Oskar Schindler, they include Gustav Schroeder, the captain of the St. Louis, and Hans von Dohnanyi, a member of the anti-Nazi resistance movement.

Poland, home to 3.3 million Jews before World War II, has contributed more names than any other country, 6,266, to the roll of Righteous Among the Nations.

Poland is followed by the Netherlands (5,108), France (3,331), Ukraine (2,363), Belgium (1,584), Lithuania (800), Hungary (764), Belarus (555), Slovakia (522), Italy (498), Germany (495), Greece (307), Russia (173), Serbia (131), Latvia (129), Czech Republic (108), Croatia (102), Austria (88), Moldova (79), Albania (69), Romania (60), Norway (47), Switzerland (45), Bosnia and Herzegovina (40), Denmark (22), Bulgaria (19), Britain (14), Armenia (19), Sweden (10), Slovenia (6), Spain 4), Estonia (3), United States (3), Republic of China (2), Brazil (2) and Portugal (2).

The following countries have each contributed one Righteous Among the Nations: Chile, El Salvador, Japan, Ireland, Georgia, Luxembourg, Montenegro, Turkey and Vietnam.

In case you're curious, the Vietnamese honoured by Yad Vashem was Paul Nguyen, who protected his Polish-Jewish wife in German-occupied France.

According to Steinfeldt, the Righteous Among the Nations program will be continued as long as nominations are submitted and supported by irrefutable evidence.

But given the passage of time, most rescuers are awarded Righteous Among the Nations status posthumously.

On a darker note, she made two points.

Some rescuers, having been branded "Jew lovers," were murdered by right-wing nationalists after the war

The names of six Righteous Among the Nations have been revoked since the program started 48 years ago.

"One man, for example, demanded sexual favours," she disclosed.

But a man who was heard to have uttered antisemitic comments after the war was not disqualified as a rescuer.

"He kept his status because of his actions during the war," she said.

She added, "The situations are not always simple."

Spain tries to capitalize on its Jewish history

Ben Harris
JTA

Feature

Hidden among the maze of alleyways east of the Onyar River, the Museum of Jewish History stands as testament – if an inadvertent one – to the completeness of Spain's destruction of its once thriving Jewish population.

Inside the museum, set in what is said to be Girona's last known synagogue, designers have layered the ancient architecture with all the flourishes of a contemporary museum, complete with glass-lit cases, multimedia displays and an audio tour in several languages.

In one case sits the signet ring belonging to Girona's most famous Jewish son, Rabbi Moses Ben Nahman Girondi, the legendary Judaic scholar known as the Ramban or Nahmanides.

The sight of the ring inspires the kind of spine-tingling intimacy with history that museums like this aim to evoke – that is, until the voice on the audio guide announces that the ring is a fake, a copy of the original that sits in a museum in Jerusalem.

In fact, most of the artifacts in Girona are copies. Virtually nothing is left from the community that once lived here, save for the tombstones excavated from the nearby Jewish cemetery. The few artifacts from the period that have survived are generally beyond the museum's financial ability to acquire.

"Once in a while we can buy something, but it's not as often as we would like," said Assumpcio Hosta, the director of Patronat Call de Girona, the municipal body responsible for the preservation of Girona's Jewish heritage. "It costs a lot of money."

That difficulty hasn't stopped nearly two dozen cities and towns throughout Spain from trying to capitalize on their Jewish history, building monuments and hosting concerts, lectures and other cultural activities inspired by one of the most productive and accomplished Jewish communities in history.

The effort has left some Jews feeling that Spain is exploiting a history that rightfully belongs to contemporary Spanish Jews, and in the process is relegating a living culture to a museum piece by portraying Judaism as little more than a historic curiosity.

The primary purpose of establishing the Spanish Jewish heritage sites is to attract tourism to areas that otherwise have little to recommend them as holiday destinations.

"The government is using the Jewish patrimony for a purpose, and the only real purpose is to bring tourism to Spain," said Rabbi Dovid Libersohn, the Argentina-born Chabad rabbi in Barcelona. "Some politicians, they like Judaism without Jews."

Museum of Jewish History in Girona

But Spanish officials involved in the effort to highlight Jewish heritage say it's not a fair or apt analysis. They note that the Spanish government has devoted resources to rebuilding its ties with Israel and with Jewish communities, in Spain and beyond. In 2006, Spain established Casa Sefarad-Israel, an agency of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs charged with promoting good relations with Spanish Jewry, the global Jewish Diaspora and the State of Israel.

Within Spain there is Red de Juderias, a network of nearly two dozen Spanish cities and towns whose official purpose is to preserve the cultural legacy of Jewish Spain but whose main aim is to promote tourist sites.

The development of Jewish heritage sites in Spain is part of a wider explosion of interest in the culture of Europe's lost Jewish communities.

Institutions such as the European Association for the Preservation and Promotion of Jewish Culture and Heritage and Warsaw's Museum of the History of the Polish Jews, and annual events like the European Day of Jewish Culture and the Jewish Culture Festival in Krakow, work to restore the Jewish place in the pantheon of European minorities. Most of these efforts are intended mostly for non-Jews, who often are the organizers.

Red de Juderias, which along with B'nai B'rith Europe co-organizes the European Day of Jewish Culture, is run in the typical manner of European bureaucracies. It has a presidency that rotates among its members and glossy, full-colour brochures printed on heavy stock. The network encompasses large cities such as Toledo, which already is a major tourist destination, and smaller towns like Besalu and Caceres, which aspire to be. More recently it established a tourist brand, Rasgo, to help direct visitors to restaurants, hotels and guides that highlight Jewish heritage.

"That heritage belongs to every citizen," said Hosta, who also is the general secretary of Red de Juderias. "It doesn't belong to a single part of the community. That's our common heritage."

But some segments of Spain's small Jewish community say Jewish heritage doesn't belong to the descendants of those who expelled the Jews 500 years ago, but to the Spanish Jewish community of today – even if the bulk of the country's Jews are relatively recent arrivals from elsewhere, principally Argentina and North Africa.

Surveys show high levels of antisemitism

They contend that Spain is exploiting Jewish history for a profit while often minimizing Spain's own culpability in bringing that history to an abrupt end. The museums and conferences and concerts and cooking demonstrations collectively present Judaism as a kind of ersatz culture divorced from a living faith.

"The way they represent Judaism is very poor," said Dominique Tomasov Blinder, a Barcelona-based architect and founder of Urban Cultours, a tour company focused on the Jewish heritage of Catalonia.

"It's a sterile collection of objects, displayed like little trophies, that were rescued from the flood of the expulsion," Blinder said. "If we had not been kicked out, all these objects would be in our synagogues, in our yeshivot, in our study centres, in our schools, our homes. And they would have a life, a purpose to be."

As evidence that Spain's priorities are misplaced, critics of the country's approach to Jewish heritage note that while much enthusiasm exists for cultural festivals and the like, local governments seem willing to trample on Jewish cemeteries.

In Barcelona, efforts to erect tourist facilities on the old Jewish cemetery on Mont Juic were halted, but only after a battle. In Toledo, once the epicentre of Jewish life in Spain, the construction of a school over the remains of a medieval Jewish cemetery sparked an international uproar, leading in 2009 to an uneasy compromise.

Meanwhile, surveys show that Spain ranks among the European countries with the highest antisemitic metrics. A 2002 study by the Anti-Defamation League asked residents of five European countries questions about their perceptions of Jews, including whether Jews have too much power and are more loyal to Israel. Spain topped in every category.

More recently, a 2008 Pew study found that 46 per cent of Spaniards viewed Jews unfavourably – the highest number in Europe and 10 percentage points higher than Poland, the next highest European country.

Diego de Ojeda, the director of Casa Sefarad-Israel, chalks this up to basic ignorance: Because there are so few Spanish Jews today, most Spaniards have never encountered a Jew in their lives. In an interview in his Madrid office, de Ojeda recalled once asking a taxi driver to take him to "la sinagoga," and the driver asked if that was the name of a new restaurant.

Casa-Sefarad Israel has brought a popular Spanish pop group to Israel for a concert and to film a video in the desert near the Dead Sea, and has helped start public celebrations of Chanukah in Madrid, something the local community failed to do on its own.

"There's not a conspiracy in Spain to say let's dig out our Jewish past so we can milk Jewish tourists," de Ojeda said. "That's also a part of it. But it's the right thing to do. We do it with our Arab culture. We do it with our Roman remains. We do it with any archaeological remains."

For Jews living in Spain today, the few vestiges of Jewish life that remain are of more than archaeological significance. They are tangible manifestations that a vital community once lived here, and help establish continuity between that community and the one that has begun to re-establish itself over the past century. Today, most of the country's Jews live in Barcelona or Madrid, and there are smaller communities in a half-dozen other spots around the country.

Dominique Tomasov Blinder

Assumpcio Horsta

Critics of Girona and similar projects are generally vague about what exactly they would do differently. They recognize the limitations under which well-intentioned non-Jews seeking to preserve Jewish heritage are operating, given that virtually all the member cities of Red de Juderias have no local Jewish communities with which to consult. And they acknowledge that they are relative newcomers to Spain, with little – and arguably less – direct connection to medieval Spanish communities.

David Stoleru, a French-Israeli architect living in Spain for nearly 15 years who has been involved in the fights over preserving Jewish cemeteries, says the real question is not who owns history, but whether it is made relevant and meaningful. And at a time when European identity is in flux, and the continent continues to grapple with the place of restive minority populations, Spain is squandering an opportunity to learn from its Jewish past.

"When Spaniards tell you it's their own heritage after kicking out Jews 500 years ago, it's a complex situation," Stoleru said. "But of course those Jewish people living and dying here, they weren't living on the moon. They were part of this context. The idea is how to re-inscribe this history in this context. That is the challenge."

Visual art at Yad Vashem

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Wielding paint brushes or charcoal pens, European Jews fought back in the face of Nazi oppression. As the Holocaust unfolded, Jewish visual artists continued working in ghettos, labour camps and hiding places.

Feature

"Art was a manifestation of resistance and defiance," said Yehudit Shendar, a senior art curator at Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority.

She added, "No matter what, artists remained artists, in a reaffirmation of the human spirit."

Hundreds of Jewish artists created a stunning portfolio of paintings, drawings and murals as they struggled to survive against the greatest of odds. More often than not, they were usually short of the essential materials of their craft – paint, pens, pencils, paper and canvas. Nonetheless, they carried on valiantly.

The Museum of Holocaust Art

The vast majority were murdered by the Nazis, but their works outlived them and are now on display in the Museum of Holocaust Art on the sprawling campus of Yad Vashem.

The world's largest repository of art from the Holocaust era, the museum is a unique institution. Its pieces, numbering in the thousands, are worth millions of dollars, but ultimately, they are priceless in value.

Yad Vashem has had an art collection from the moment it opened in the early 1950s, but a dedicated museum was not built until 1983.

The collection is spread around widely.

Three hundred works are displayed in the museum itself. Another 250 are found in the Holocaust History Museum. Still others appear at temporary exhibits, here and abroad. About 50 sculptures are scattered throughout the grounds. Many more works remain in storage.

Shendar acquires about 400 new pieces each year, mostly from overseas donors. She checks the provenance of each one to ensure proper ownership and authenticity.

In terms of content, they are eclectic, defying conventional wisdom of what Holocaust art should be.

"Everything we have is about the Holocaust, even if you don't see crematorium chimneys or barbed wire," she said while conducting a tour of the museum for a group of journalists from Canada invited to Israel by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

"So if you see a still life of a platter of apples, it is still technically Holocaust art," she explained.

In large part, the artists are internationally known. Kathe Lowenthal (1877-1942), a German national, and Malva Schalek (1882-1944), a Czech, may not be so famous. But Felix Nussbaum (1904-1944) and Bruno Schulz (1892-1942) are universally renowned figures.

Born in Osnabruck, Germany, Nussbaum was a student in Rome when Adolf Hitler seized power in 1933. Realizing he had no future in his homeland, he and his wife-to-be, Felka Platek, a fellow painter, went into exile in Brussels. After Belgium was invaded by Germany in 1940, Nussbaum was arrested and taken to a camp in France.

He escaped and returned to Brussels, his friends providing him with shelter and art supplies. While in hiding, he produced three of his best works, Camp Synagogue, St. Cyprien, Self Portrait with Jewish Identity Card and Triumph of Death.

Having been arrested by the Germans, Nussbaum and his wife were sent to Auschwitz in the summer of 1944. There they perished.

Although some of Nussbaum's paintings have found a home at Yad Vashem, many of his works have been permanently exhibited at Felix Nussbaum Haus in Osnabruck since 1998.

Schulz, a Polish Jew born in what was then the Austro-Hungarian Empire and is now Ukraine, studied architecture in Lwow and Vienna. Returning to Poland, he taught drawing in a Polish school from 1924 until 1941.

Schulz distinguished himself as a novelist, writing The Street of Crocodiles and Sanatorium under the Sign of the Hourglass. The museum, however, celebrates him as a muralist.

Forced into a ghetto in Drohobycz, Schulz was protected by a Gestapo officer, Felix Landau, who admired his drawings.

Schulz finished a series of murals in Landau's home, but they were painted over and forgotten after Schulz was shot and killed by Landau's rival, Karl Gunther.

The murals, including Carriage Driver, resemble ancient Roman frescoes. They were discovered by a German filmmaker in 2001, and shortly afterward, Yad Vashem purchased five of the fragments.

Surprisingly enough, the museum has no catalogue of its vast holdings. Shendar is still looking for a donor who'd be willing to contribute about $400,000, the cost of publishing a catalogue worthy of its name.

In the meantime, some 200 of its paintings and drawings already have been posted on the Internet.

Like its collection of Holocaust art, Yad Vashem's photo archives is massive in scope. Daniel Uziel, its director, said, "We have 240,000 photographs, and 131,000 have been uploaded on Yad Vashem's website."

Encompassing the pre-war and postwar periods, the unrivalled collection is the biggest of its kind in the world.

There are 14,300 photographs of Nazi camps, 22,791 photographs of ghettos (primarily of Lodz and Warsaw), 3,305 photographs of deportations, 906 photographs of executions and 16,940 photographs of children caught up in the Holocaust. "We have no photographs of gassings," said Uziel.

German news photographers attached to Germany's armed forces photographed a sizable proportion of the images in Yad Vashem's possession, he noted in an interview.

Much to his disappointment, he has been unable to acquire wartime photographs from the former Soviet Union, where more than one million Jews were murdered by the Nazis and local collaborators. But he has had no problem buying photographs from the Baltic states.

In the future, Uziel hopes to streamline the digitization process – which began in 1993 – and improve outreach through newer online platforms.

"These are among the challenges that lie ahead," he said.

Liat Benhabib, director of Yad Vashem's Visual Center, is in charge of tending to its collection of more than 6,500 films on the Holocaust. They run the gamut from Hollywood and European feature films to documentaries. In her estimation, 7,000 to 10,000 Holocaust-themed films have been made in the past 55 years.

She claims that Night and Fog, a French documentary released in 1955, was the first film ever to deal directly with Nazi crimes against humanity. But in an attempt to universalize the issue, the director did not mention the word "Holocaust" and, shockingly enough, referred only once to its Jewish victims.

Much has changed for the better since then, of course.

Israeli hotels upgrade for business travellers

Steve K. Walz
Special to The CJN

The emergence of Israel on the global high-tech stage as a "startup nation," combined with the growing number of international business and Jewish organizations that are holding events in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, has spurred some major hotels to upgrade their services.

"The growth of social media, which includes business- and travel-oriented forums (such as LinkedIn), has allowed our staff to engage with people who are planning business trips to Jerusalem and other points in Israel, offering them the opportunity to take advantage of the hotel's varied services, many of which are tailored to the business tourist," said Ilan Brenner, the Inbal Jerusalem Hotel's executive assistant manager of sales and marketing. The five-star hotel regularly hosts conferences, including recent El Al, Hadassah and Jewish Agency events.

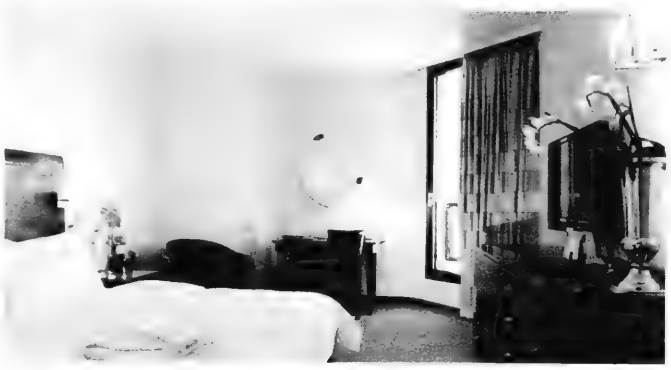
Feature

"As there are several types of business travellers, ranging from a high-powered executive who seeks a luxurious Wi-Fi equipped suite with a terrace that overlooks the Old City of Jerusalem to a salesperson who might want to conduct a private meeting with a colleague in our rooftop Executive Lounge, we can provide a variety of settings based on need and budget," said Brenner.

"Since we have added our spa and health club, many local and foreign business people have also used their after-hours down time to work off the daily stress and reinvigorate their body and soul. We also offer all of our guests, including business customers, free tickets to a number of fascinating local cultural attractions."

In Greater Tel Aviv, where the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange and many of the nation's top corporations are located, a number of the city's finest hotels regularly cater to business clientele. However, several hotels have tweaked their interior-design concepts and external marketing agendas to discourage family tourism and focus almost exclusively on luring upscale business travellers.

The posh Crowne Plaza Tel Aviv City Center Hotel, which has been built into the prodigious Azrieli Towers business, shopping and entertainment complex, prides itself on being a "concept" facility. "We like to think of ourselves as a leader in the development of the business tourist concept," said Michael Plesz, general manager of the Crowne Plaza Tel Aviv City Center Hotel. "Nearly 60 per cent of our customers are business people, 85 per cent of whom come from overseas, including, of course, North America. The upbeat design of our public areas and rooms enhances the notion of a place where one can find the right atmosphere to do business and rest between meetings.



Executive Room at the Inbal Jerusalem Hotel

"We have very few rooms that can accommodate children, so there's more quiet time and a relaxed atmosphere in the hotel. We also offer free Wi-Fi, a 24/7 business lounge, as well as free entrance to the renowned Holmes Place Spa and Fitness Club downstairs. And because our hotel sits above one of Tel Aviv's main train stations, one can hop aboard a train and travel all over the country for business and pleasure."

In addition, Tel Aviv's renowned beach, bar and restaurant scene is a magnet for business tourists.

Want to know more about which hotel offers the most enticing business and relaxation combination packages? We've compiled an abridged list of hotels that offer a myriad of business services and pampering perks

In Jerusalem

• Inbal Jerusalem Hotel: There are dozens of beautiful suites and executive or deluxe rooms to choose from in this venerable facility. The intimate Executive Lounge offers a computer station, a variety of newspapers and magazines and light meals and snacks. In order to keep the lounge as an exclusive benefit, its use is restricted to guest staying in suites or executive or deluxe rooms. There is also a 24/7 business centre featuring a variety of services upon request. There are special corporate rates available to companies that commit themselves to a minimal annual turnover. For more information, visit www.inbalhotel.com.

• David Citadel Hotel: The Executive Lounge, located high above the city ,offers a spectacular view of the Old City and provides a perfect setting for business people who wish to mingle, nosh or conduct one-on-one meetings. The hotel also offers a wide range of rooms that cater to the various needs of business travellers. Special arrangements can be made for private spa treatments in guest rooms or in the hotel's new spa and health club downstairs. Private concierge service is also available for VIPs, which includes arranging special transportation to local events and cultural attractions. Private tour guides can also be arranged. The hotel plays host to a variety of business functions in its adjustable meeting rooms and halls. The David Citadel complex also includes the critically acclaimed Scala Restaurant & Bar, as well as the Mamilla Rooftop Café. For more information, visit www.thedavidcitadel.com.

In Tel Aviv

• Sheraton Tel Aviv Hotel & Towers: The entire third floor has been reconfigured to meet the needs of business guests. It features a brand-new business centre, 12 newly designed guest rooms and meeting areas. The rooms offer both technology and visibility. They feature a work desk, ergonomic chair, Wi-Fi and land-line connectivity, along with sound-proof windows that overlook the sea, as well as a step-out balcony. The rooms have been outfitted with flat-screen TV, Nespresso machine and a MediaHub HD connectivity, which automatically identifies the last electronic device plugged into it – laptop, digital camera, PlayStation, iPod and others – and switches the TV to it. In addition, all the new rooms feature a stall shower instead of a bathtub. "This is a new market trend, especially among the business travel community," said Jean-Louis Ripoche, the Sheraton's general manager. "Most of our business guests are too busy to use a tub, or they are just not interested in it." The meeting rooms are complemented by a modular, multi-functional hall divisible by means of soundproof moveable partitions. Each room has its own audiovisual equipment – LCD projector, screens, bulletin boards – and coffee break stations. For more information, visit www.sheratontelaviv.com.

• David Intercontinental Hotel: The David InterContinental Tel Aviv offers two new highly stylized business lounges, the Executive Lounge on the third floor and the Club InterContinental on the 24th floor. In addition, the redesigned Club InterContinental Lounge on the 24th floor offers greater food diversity and enhanced services. Both lounges offer Wi-Fi and business services, including a copier, printer and fax. The Club InterContinental Tel Aviv offers private check-in and check-out services, and private concierge services with activities designed to match busy schedules, including the handling of itineraries and access to restaurants and shows at the last minute. The newly renovated Aubergine restaurant offers a business lunch specializing in Mediterranean delicacies. The David InterContinental Tel Aviv offers a full-service spa and fitness centre, as well as a ritzy sports and cigar bar called Inca. For more information, visit www.intercontinental.com.

• Crowne Plaza Tel Aviv City Center Hotel: Guests receive an automatic upgrade to a deluxe room. Each room highlights spectacular panoramic views of Tel Aviv. Business travellers receive a voucher for a free drink, a daily paper in English, welcome refreshments and free entrance to the spa and health club, with a 15 per cent discount for treatments. Free city tours are offered to guests every Saturday. A variety of meeting rooms are available upon request. Guest rooms are equipped with free Wi-Fi service. The Crowne Plaza City Center also features an upscale kosher restaurant. For more information, visit www.afi-hotels.com.

• Prima Tel Aviv Hotel: Located directly across from the bustling seaside promenade, the hotel is popular with businessmen and vacationers alike who wish to enjoy a quality hotel in a central city location and enjoy a deluxe breakfast overlooking the sea. Each of the hotel's floors is dedicated to a renowned Israeli artist who lived and worked in Tel Aviv. Additionally, the hotel's stairwells are adorned with large, mural photographs of well-known city boulevards. For more information, visit www.prima-hotel-israel.com.

In Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and outside the cities

• Rimonim Hotels: The growing chain, which features hotels all over Israel, stresses the pleasure aspect within the "business and pleasure" equation. Many business people quietly take a break by relaxing in one of the chain's spa hotel resorts in Tiberias and the Dead Sea. Rimonim is currently offering a special Discover & Drive package that includes a three-night stay at any of the Rimonim hotels and a three-day Hertz car rental. The idea behind the package is to encourage guests to explore several Rimonim properties during their stay in Israel. A sample itinerary for the north of Israel would be a combination of a stay at the Jerusalem or Tel Aviv Rimonim hotels, with three nights at the Rimonim Galei Kinnereth Hotel on the banks of Lake Kinneret (Tiberias) or three nights in mystical Safed at the Rimonim Safed Boutique Hotel. Six nights in the south could combine the luxurious Royal Dead Sea Hotel, with the Rimonim Eilat, located on the shores of the Red Sea. For more information about the Rimonim hotels, visit, http://english.rimonim.com.

Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas was received as a returning hero in the West Bank after he addressed the United Nations last week. Here he is seen attending an event in Ramallah on Saturday hosted by Palestinian children to support recent actions by the Palestinian leadership at the UN. Abbas and the PA have been cool to the proposals of the Quartet to resume negotiations with Israel. The Israeli cabinet has conditionally agreed. [Issam Rimawi/Flash 90 photo]

Israel accepts proposal for talks

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel has accepted the proposal of the Mideast Quartet – comprising the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia – to renew peace negotiations with the Palestinians.

The plan accepted Sunday by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his eight senior cabinet members would restart negotiations within a month without preconditions.

"Israel welcomes the Quartet's call for direct negotiations between the parties without preconditions, as called for by both [U.S.] President [Barack] Obama and Prime Minister Netanyahu," read a statement issued Sunday by the Prime Minister's Office.

"While Israel has some concerns, it will raise them at the appropriate time. Israel calls on the Palestinian Authority to do the same and to enter into direct negotiations without delay," the short statement concluded.

The concerns include the short timetable for negotiations on border and security issues, and the issues of Palestinian refugees and recognition of Israel as a Jewish state, Ha'aretz reported.

The inner cabinet met last week for five hours and failed to agree to support the plan at that time.

The PA has balked at the Quartet plan, saying it will not return to talks until Israel freezes settlement building. The Palestinians recently submitted a bid for statehood to the UN Security Council, which the council is now considering. The United States has said it will veto the bid.

A U.S. State Department statement welcomed the Israeli cabinet's decision, but called on both sides to fully embrace the Quartet proposal. The State Department missive alluded to both Israel's reluctance to accept the timetable and the Palestinian refusal to talk until settlement stops.

"The U.S. once again calls on both parties to resume negotiations without preconditions, on the timetable proposed by the Quartet, as the best means to advance their interests, resolve their differences, and fulfil the president's two-state vision," it said.

CHAT Student Wins

VANCOUVER — A student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto placed first in the high school category of the Fraser Institute's annual student essay contest. Lori Ossip, a Grade 12 student who graduated last June, won $500 for an essay on the contest's topic, "Is Capitalism Dead?" which attracted 180 entries from university and high school students across North America and around the world, the right-wing think-tank said. Ossip's paper explored how "Adam Smith's 'invisible hand' and Schumpeter's creative destruction theories [demonstrate] how capitalists' self-interest promotes freedom and leads to innovations that benefit society as a whole," the institute said.

WORLD

Jews Cool To Obama

WASHINGTON, D.C. — U.S. Jews approve and disapprove of President Barack Obama's performance in roughly equal numbers, says a new poll by the American Jewish Committee. The annual survey, conducted Sept. 6 to 21, found 45 per cent of 800 Jews polled approve of Obama, while 48 per cent disapprove, with a three per cent margin of error. That's down from 57 per cent who approved of him in 2010. Much of the disappointment stems from his economic policies, although there was a drop relating to how he's handling U.S.-Israel relations, with 53 per cent disapproving and 40 per cent approving, versus 45 per cent disapproval and 49 per cent approval in 2010.

Nazi Links Admitted

BERLIN — The family that owns BMW has admitted to using slave labour in World War II. Some 50,000 forced labourers are said to have worked in the factories of Guenther Quandt, producing arms for the Nazis, a study showed. Gabriele Quandt, grandson of Guenther Quandt, told the newspaper Die Zeit that it was "wrong" for the family to ignore this part of its history. An independent study done for the family found Guenther Quandt and his son, Herbert, helped bolster the Nazis. The three-year study was commissioned after a German TV report made the accusation based on access to the firm's wartime files. Guenther Quandt is also accused of taking over Jewish firms during the war, with the Nazis' blessing. The family bought BMW shares years after the war. Guenther Quandt joined the Nazi party in 1933. He died in 1954. The family still owns a majority of shares in the luxury car maker.

Liberals Decry Pro-Israel Group 'Takeover'

OTTAWA — Members of the federal Liberal party are crying foul after MPs from the governing Tories wrested control of a pro-Israel friendship group.

MPs gathered last week in Ottawa to elect a new executive committee for the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group. Between 50 and 60 Conservative members showed up, compared to three Liberals, PostMedia News reported.

David Sweet

Ten Conservatives and two Liberals put their names forward. All six members elected to the executive were Conservatives.

Toronto Liberal MP Carolyn Bennett, who chaired the friendship group for five years, acknowledged a low turnout by Liberals contributed to her defeat. But she alleged Conservative lawmakers were told how to vote by the pro-Israel government so they could take control of what is supposed to be a nonpartisan association.

"I was quite surprised by this juggernaut approach to taking over 100 per cent of the executive positions on what is supposed to be a parliamentary friendship group," she said. "Obviously this is something that was managed centrally."

But the group's new chair denied the Prime Minister's Office packed the meeting with Tories or told them how to vote. "It was a free vote," MP David Sweet said. "Those who were interested found time to show. You'd have to ask the Liberals why only three of their members did."

Dead Sea Scrolls now viewable online

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Dead Sea Scrolls have gone digital.

Archeology buffs and Bible enthusiasts worldwide are likely rejoicing after the announcement last week that the Israel Museum and Google have made the scrolls available in ultra-high resolution for anyone to view online.

It's called the Dead Sea Scrolls Digital Project.

The museum and the Internet search giant made the oldest biblical document known to man viewable online last week and also offered viewers English translations of the scriptures.

"We are privileged to house in the Israel Museum's Shrine of the Book the best preserved and most complete Dead Sea Scrolls ever discovered," James Snyder director of the Israel Museum said. "They are of paramount importance among the touchstones of monotheistic world heritage, and they represent unique highlights of our museum's encyclopedic holdings. Now, through our partnership with Google, we are able to bring these treasures to the broadest possible public."

Users can interact with five of the scrolls online with startling clarity. The interface software allows viewers to zoom-in on the scrolls to the point where one can see the imperfections and texture of the animal hide they were written on.

Portion of Dead Sea Scrolls

"Details invisible to the naked eye are made visible through ultra-high resolution digital photography by photographer Ardon Bar-Hama. At 1,200 megapixels each, these images are almost 200 times higher in resolution than those produced by a standard camera," the museum's website states.

Digitized scrolls thus far are the Great Isaiah Scroll, the Community Rule Scroll, the Commentary on Habakkuk Scroll, the Temple Scroll, and the War Scroll.

The Great Isaiah Scroll is searchable by column, chapter and verse, and is accompanied by an English translation tool and by an option for users to submit translations of verses in their own languages, according to the museum.

Prof. Yossi Matias, managing director of Google's research and development centre in Israel, said it was his hope to one day "make all existing knowledge in historical archives and collections available to all, including putting additional Dead Sea Scroll documents online."

The Dead Sea Scrolls date back to the third century BCE and were discovered between 1947 and 1956 in 11 caves on the northwestern shores of the Dead Sea.

The manuscripts are generally attributed to an isolated Jewish sect, referred to in the scrolls as "the Community," who settled in Qumran in the Judean desert, the museum's website explains.

To see the scrolls, visit the Israel Museum website at www.english.imjnet.org.il/htmls/home.aspx.

The UN's greatest enemies

From the editor's desk...

Much was made of the speech delivered last week by Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird at the United Nations as a strong defence of Israel.

It is indeed true that the foreign minister reiterated Canada's unambiguous support for the Jewish state.

"We uphold Israel's right to exist," Baird said. "We uphold its fundamental right, like any member state [of the United Nations], to defend innocent civilians against acts of terrorism."

And in the context of the key tension filling the air in the grand chamber of the General Assembly, he also called upon the Palestinian leaders to negotiate their way to a peace agreement with Israel.

"Our government's position has been clear – the only solution to this issue is one that is negotiated by the two parties themselves. We continue to encourage both sides to accept these principles and return to direct talks based on a two-state solution without delay or preconditions."

But Baird's speech actually dealt very little with Canada's support of Israel. And did so, only as an example of the Canadian tradition "to stand for what is principled and just, regardless of whether it is popular or convenient or expedient."

The actual substance of the foreign minister's speech was a chronicle of Canada's historic support of the United Nations, as a testament to the common standing of the founding values of the United Nations with the values that infuse Canadian society.

"The founding principles of these United Nations are more than mere words. It is our duty to pull them from the printed page, to breathe life into them, and to practise them every day," Baird emphasized.

In the forceful concluding paragraphs of his speech, however, Baird lamented how the UN's founding values are mocked and betrayed by so many members of the institution.

"The UN's relevance and effectiveness are imperilled when the founding principles are observed in word but not in deed."

In the saddeningly long list of glaring, blatant member hypocrisies, Baird included Iran.

"Or when Iran, which mocks the values of this organization through outrages such as refusing to allow entry to UN observers on human rights, is permitted to seek leadership roles, such as a vice-presidency of the General Assembly and a spot on the commission on population and development."

In light of the latest spewings of anti-Israel hatred by the leaders of Tehran, this past weekend, Baird's words at the General Assembly were oracular in their force

Speaking at the "fifth International Conference in Support of the Palestinian Intifadah" in Tehran, Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei rebuked the two-state solution for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict because "all land belongs to Palestinians."

Rather than simply uttering vapid nostrums, however, the supreme leader purported to give advice to the decision makers involved in trying to find a solution to the conflict. He very generously said, "We neither propose dumping the migrant Jews in the sea."

His suggestion was a pan-Palestinian referendum on the fate of the Jews of Israel. "Rather our proposal includes a referendum to be participated by all Palestinians."

Khamenei also issued a warning to the West: "It should either leave its age-old bullying and recognize the rights of the Palestinians or wait for harder blows in the near future."

It appears that the movement of Jews from Israel was the key theme that the theocrats of Iran were trying to develop over the weekend. For, speaking to media on Saturday Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said: "The solution is simple... everyone should go home. Some poor people were brought to Palestine on the promise of security and jobs while they made Palestinian people into refugees... So now Palestinians should go home and those brought here should go to theirs."

One thing that can be said for Ahmadinejad's solution is that it is without nuance. We know where he stands. We also know where his supreme leader stands.

They advocate the elimination of the Jewish state of Israel.

That Iran aspires to leadership within the committees and other structures of the United Nations "imperils" the organization's relevance, to use Baird's words. Iran "undermines the principles" of the UN. As such, again using the foreign minister's words, it is one of the organization's "greatest enemies."

PROTESTING FOR GILAD

Israelis who were former prisoners of war held signs last week saying, "Sorry that I'm still alive," during a demonstration outside the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem. They were calling attention to the ongoing imprisonment of kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit. Schalit has been in Hamas captivity since June 2006. The names of the protesters were not revealed. Around their necks is a sign identifying them as redeemed prisoners.

Community remembers victims of Shoah

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem held its annual memorial yizkor ceremony at Earl Bales Park last Sunday to commemorate the six million Jews who perished in the Holocaust.

Despite the miserable weather on Oct. 2, dozens of survivors, politicians, city officials and members of the public braved the cold and rain to light candles, lay wreaths and recite Kaddish.

"Today, we pray for the souls of loved ones who left this world, many without families to say Kaddish for them," said Fran Sonshine, national chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem. "We remember their lives, and we remember the tragic consequences of hate and intolerance."

The annual yizkor ceremony takes place next to the Wall of Remembrance in Earl Bales Park in Toronto, where surviving family members have engraved the names of loved ones who died.

"Today is a day to remember those who were murdered in unthinkable acts, but it's also a day to understand," said Environment Minister Peter Kent. "More than six decades later, the hatred still lives on, and the threats facing Jews today are the greatest since the Shoah. We ourselves must bear responsibility for our own chapter in history, and for that we will ensure that the Jewish people never again have to stand alone."

Hadas Wittenburg Silberstein, deputy consul general of Israel, stressed to the crowd how important it is to remember those who died simply because they were Jewish. "At a time when a Holocaust denier speaks at the United Nations, we must renew our determination to live freely as Jews," she said. "We remember, so it won't happen again."

Students from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto read the names of some of the 1.5 million Jewish children who died in the Holocaust. After a performance by a local children's chorus, guests were invited to light candles to commemorate those who perished as well as those who survived. Candles were also lit in honour of the non-Jewish individuals who risked their lives to rescue others and the new generations who would carry the universal message of the Shoah into the future.

"My father came to Canada as the only survivor in his family," said MP Mark Adler. "He had just three things – the number on his arm, the shirt on his back and hope in his heart. I'm honoured to be here not just as an MP but as someone who lives Yom Hashoah every day in his heart," he said.

Adler and Kent weren't the only politicians in attendance. York Centre's MPP Monte Kwinter, the first politician to recite Kaddish in the Ontario legislature, delivered a greeting from Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty, while York Centre Ontario PC candidate Michael Mostyn read a message from Ontario PC leader Tim Hudak. Ontario Minister of Citizenship and Immigration Eric Hoskins, Federal Minister of Natural Resources Joe Oliver and Toronto city councillors David Shiner, James Pasternak, Alan Shefman and Joe Mihevc attended, alongside Toronto police chief Bill Blair. They were invited to place wreaths on a memorial monument.

After the speeches, a cantor led the crowd in reciting Kaddish before the shofar was blown.

"The legacy of these people has not been forgotten. What happened in the Shoah has irretrievably altered the collective of the Jewish people and all of humankind," said Sonshine. "We are reminded of the perils of intolerance, racism and antisemitism. These dangers urge us to stand together, prevail over evil and light the path towards justice and truth."

JNF party raises funds for kibbutz sports field

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Hundreds of young professionals recently gathered at Toronto's Corus Quay for a night of fun and philanthropy at the JNF Future Party.

The Sept. 22 event, which featured a performance by platinum recording artist MC Hammer, raised funds to help develop a sports field in Kibbutz Hahotrim in Israel's northern Carmel coast.

In 2000, the kibbutz economy collapsed. The newly elected JNF (Jewish National Fund) Future Party committee – Stephen Arbib, Lesley Glowinsky, Alana Konopny, Darren Slavens and Candace Zwicker – chose to support the residents of Hahotrim by improving their community.

"We wanted to make a difference in people's day-to-day lives," said Slavens. "We were given the chance to affect a small group of people that have fallen on some tough times and try to make their lives a little better."

The committee members "have a real passion for helping Israel and the Jewish community in Toronto," said JNF Future co-chair Jessica Fenton, who shares co-chairing duties with Jian Magen.

"We looked for those with large and diverse networks because one of our biggest goals, since we launched JNF Future a year and a half ago, has been to familiarize as many young professionals as possible with JNF," Fenton said.

She said she hopes the committee members for the Future Party, as well as for other JNF Future events, "will be ambassadors for the JNF brand, help spread the word about the organization among their peers and get them excited about the many wonderful initiatives that JNF is involved with in Israel and around the world."

JNF Future encourages young professionals to "take their rightful place within the Jewish community and supports them in their endeavours to help build a brighter future for Israel," Fenton said. "What makes the organization particularly unique is that all funds raised from any event are sent directly to Israel and allocated to specific projects that are selected by JNF Future committee members."

JNF Future members and supporters can therefore choose exactly where their funds are being directed and see how their dedication is making a positive impact on the lives of Israeli citizens, she said.

Since last year's Future Party, "a lot more people between the ages of 25 and 45 have become familiar with JNF and the many amazing projects and initiatives that the organization is involved with," Fenton said.

Involving young people in such fundraising efforts is especially important, said Slavens, because Israel is becoming "increasingly isolated" in the world. "Faced with this growing reality, I believe it's important for our generation to be out in the public eye, showing our community, our country and the people of Israel that we are proud of Israel and we stand with her. If we don't step up and do it, we have to realize that no one will."

Upcoming JNF Future events include the Mother/Daughter Cook for a Cause on Oct. 27 and the JNF Hoops Classic on Nov. 13.

Commendations to Canada

Last week, on perhaps the most grandiose stage in New York, the curtain went up on the latest scene in the long-running Israeli-Palestinian melodrama. Or is it, by now, a farce? It is however, without doubt, a cause for long and sustained weeping.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas made his expedient, cynical pitch to the nations of the world for immediate recognition of an independent Palestinian state. A decision on the request, made to the Security Council, has been, wisely, postponed. In the period before the council actually votes on the request, perhaps the two parties will find a way to return to direct, face-to-face negotiations.

That is certainly the hope of the American government, which expressed its preference for bilateral talks to unilateral ploys and unequivocally promised to veto a unilateral declaration of statehood. The government of Canada, too, stood firmly on the side of negotiations. Prime Minister Stephen Harper said it plainly last week in New York. "[I]f the PA is serious about establishing a sovereign state, the method to do that is not a declaration here at the UN."

Four days later, at the General Assembly rostrum, Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird, echoed the government's support for democracy and for the nurturing of democratic systems around the world: "We supported the aspirations of those peoples who sought for themselves and their countries brighter futures during the Arab Spring that just passed. But we will not go along with the unilateral actions of the Palestinian Authority."

As we have in the past, we commend the government's strong support for policies that reiterate the need to ensure Israel's secure place in the Middle East and that support Israel's call for direct negotiations with the PA.

Even Globe and Mail columnist Jeffrey Simpson has noted that Harper's support of the Jewish state is actually counterproductive to domestic political considerations, but is rather anchored in a belief system that holds in high esteem common democratic values. Simpson recently wrote that "Mr. Harper might have had partisan political considerations in mind in supporting a Netanyahu view of Israel's situation. But he also felt deeply about Israel as a democracy, sharing Canadian values, surrounded by Arab sham democracies, theocracies and dictatorships. For him, it was a black-and-white matter."

As Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, observed, the prime minister articulates a position "that has cross-party support on Parliament Hill."

And that is because it is a position that refuses to surrender the Middle East's only democracy, Israel, to the schemes and false promises of all the other countries in the region.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israeli foreign minister Yitzhak Shamir addressed the United Nations General Assembly a week before taking over as prime minister from Shimon Peres, as agreed to in the national unity coalition agreement between the Likud and Labor parties. Likudnik Shamir told the UN that Israel stood ready to make peace with its neighbours, as it had done with Egypt in 1979.

The legacy of the Holocaust

Eli Rubenstein's excellent article "Is the Holocaust unique?" (Sept. 8) has left me wondering: what now? What to do about this legacy at this moment in time? How does a nation make sense of having been the victim of this kind of horror, and what does one do with it now? For me, the inescapable answer is that, as the people who know, perhaps best, what it is to be targeted by a systematic, genocidal, murderous campaign, Jews have a kind of authority to speak about it that others do not have. And, therefore, there may be a holy obligation to be the light in the world that shines on all genocide, on all murderous campaigns. When you know, you are obliged to do something.

I think this informed the brave Jews who fought for civil rights in the 1950s and '60s in the United States and others around the world who have taken up the causes of those who struggle against injustice and tyranny. I agree, even more strongly after having read this piece, that the Holocaust is unique. How can that experience, all that suffering and loss – all those innocent and precious Jewish lives – best be honoured? And, how do we honour Andrew Goodman, Michael Shwerner and the others who have lost their lives fighting to ensure the civil rights of others? The only way forward is "never again," not anywhere to anyone and to lead the way in that endeavour. It is that very uniqueness, the glimpse of the very face of evil, that demands action. The article fills me with a desire to honour the dead by helping, somehow, to make this manifest.

Zero-tolerance for antisemitism

In the article "McGuinty pledges cash for Mount Sinai" (Sept. 28), it is stated that "since the start of the electoral campaign, The CJN had repeatedly called on both [Ontario PC Party leader Tim] Hudak and [NDP leader Andrea] Horwath to tell readers where they stand on continued provincial trade with Israel, among other topics of interest to the community." I wish to ensure that my position on issues of importance to the Jewish community, including trade with Israel, is clear.

I would honour existing memorandums of understanding with Israel and continue to explore opportunities with Israel that would be of mutual benefit to both jurisdictions and to businesses in Ontario. Israel and Ontario have a tremendous opportunity to leverage the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement to increase and foster bilateral trade and investment in a number of areas, including clean-water technology and more efficient water use for wetlands restoration and agriculture. The Ontario PC Party, under my leadership, will take a zero-tolerance approach to any and all acts of antisemitism in the province, including the universities. Our government will expect the laws to be vigorously enforced to protect our citizens from hateful acts.

The Ontario PC party and I wish the Jewish community a Happy, Healthy, Prosperous and Sweet New Year. Shanah Tovah!

Tim Hudak, MPP
Leader
Ontario PC Party

Hate rally not officially condemned

As Eglinton-Lawrence's only Jewish candidate for MPP among the major parties, I commend you for bringing attention to the obscene display of antisemitism that recently soiled the steps of Queen's Park ("Antisemitic rally held at Queen's Park, Sept. 8). It is indeed an outrage that no public officials have condemned this. I assure you that as an MPP, I would speak out against such hatred – both as a Jew, and as simply a person of conscience.

It's especially inspiring to have the article, "Israeli trade minister drums up business during visit" (Sept. 22), remind me of how closely Israel's values align with those of the Green Party of Canada. Your reporter recounts how the Israeli trade minister met with MaRS (an organization that connects science, business and government), hospital directors, representatives of the Ontario Clean Water Agency and machers at the Toronto International Film Festival. Meanwhile, it's right in the front of the Green party platform that we passionately support investment in the jobs of the 21st century, such as biomedical technology, health care, clean water and creativity.

Old habits die hard: divided in peace, united in war

Arie Raif

When the first intifadah erupted in 1987, then-Israel Defence Forces chief of staff Gen. Dan Shomron gave all his generals copies of Alistair Horne's book A Savage War for Peace: Algeria 1954-1962. The moral of this book, which explores the struggle of the FLN (National Liberation Front) against French rule in Algeria, is that you can't defeat a popular national movement by force alone. That's why France ultimately left Algeria. Will the same happen with Israel and the West Bank?

The question has taken on added relevance following the Palestinian demand for independence at the United Nations on Sept. 23. The appeal, made by Palestinian Authority leader Mahmoud Abbas, may give the region an opportunity for change with a move toward a different reality and a new kind of discussion between equals.

The Palestinians have a right to independence. After all, freedom and self-determination are basic rights, not a privilege. We, the Jewish people, should know this. We took our destiny into our own hands and asked the international community to acknowledge our status as a people and our right to establish a free, independent state. Looking at our own history, it's not hard to see where the Palestinians got their inspiration.

Over the years, Israel has avoided dealing with the offers of peace from the other side. Jerusalem has done this by way of a strict interpretation and analysis of the wording of UN resolutions or peace proposals. It strips them of any merit with endless deliberation, it has negotiations that persist forever, and it imposes conditions the other side can't accept, rendering the initiative dead in the water. More recently, Israel's contention that the PA did not come to the negotiating table proves again another denial of truth and facts.

For 44 years, the settlements have eroded Israel's ability to reason, leading instead to both arrogance and folly.

Israeli politicians reveal a contradiction between their declared positions and their behaviour in practice, one based on the country's electoral system – a dysfunctional system that leads inevitably to cynical coalition agreements that inhibit much needed change. It's fertile ground for false images and half-truths to prevail.

"A state that seeks peace with its enemies must, before anything else, change its mental approach to them so that it views them as potential partners," Israeli journalist Uzi Benziman wrote in a 2006 article titled "Is Israel a Partner?"

"If the enemy is a priori perceived as a devil whose hatred cannot be overcome, then the chances of reaching an understanding with him are null," Benziman writes.

Others have recognized the danger of such a mindset in Israel that has a disproportionate influence on government policy.

"For the past 40 years, the term 'consensus' has been the axis of Israeli politics," Ze'ev Sternhell wrote in Ha'aretz in 2007 in an article titled "The Consensus Trap." "This key concept refers to national agreement on operative plans that are meant to shape the future of Israeli society. From the Six Day War until today, however, these nationally agreed upon schemes have had one thing in common: They are nothing short of self-delusion."

Indeed, no political program that has enjoyed the overwhelming support of the Israeli public has ever materialized. The first of these plans that won national consensus was the one in force from the Six Day War until the mid-1980s. The three main principles were (a) there is no Palestinian people and there will never be a Palestinian state; (b) the West Bank will be divided between Israel and Jordan, and large parts of it will be annexed for defence purposes and territorial expansion; (c) the 1967 borders are Auschwitz borders and Yasser Arafat is Hitler II.

Many Israelis don't want to recognize that the world has changed.

"In order to get this new reality into its skull, Israel needed the military fiasco of the first war in Lebanon, which did not achieve a single one of its objectives, and the shock of the intifadah at the end of the 1980s," Sternhell writes. "In the wake of the (1993) Oslo accords, a second consensus came into being, according to which temporary meant permanent: it was roundly agreed and accepted that there was no immediate solution to the conflict, and one could only be reached gradually, in a process stretching out over many years. The end of the process was invariably shrouded in mist, and who knew what would happen in the meantime. In this way, the need to rethink the settlement enterprise could be ignored, and the flow of money and people into the territories could continue unabated.

"Only in the days of Ehud Barak as prime minister (1999 – 2001), did the idea of two states for two peoples begin to take shape. However – and this was Barak's great failure – the idea was not backed up with an order to stop building the settlements. The Palestinians were also very much responsible for the collapse of this plan, imprisoned in their dream of return and hopes of wearing Israel down."

Today, most Israelis subscribe to the two-state solution, convinced it will help free the country from the yoke of occupation and international delegitimization. I want a country with a Jewish majority that is neither an apartheid regime nor a binational state where Jews will become a minority by mid-century. Unless some dramatic change takes place right away, this key existential problem will never be resolved.

We must change our way of thinking.

Abbas is not Arafat. I hope we still have him as a partner. Just weeks ago, he stated:

- "We don't want to isolate Israel but to live with it in peace and security," adding that the PA had been pushing Arab states to recognize Israel.
- "We don't want to delegitimize Israel. We want to legitimize ourselves."
- "The PA and Israel have good security co-ordination to prevent terror and keep the situation calm and quiet. We will continue to do our job."
- "Our first, second and third priority is negotiations. There is no other way to solve this."

Abbas revealed that in late August, he had met Defence Minister Ehud Barak in Jordan, his second such meeting over the past year. He noted that Barak had also met several times with PA Prime Minister Salam Fayyad.

Abbas confirmed he had met with President Shimon Peres three times over the past year in Europe and Jordan. Elected democratically in 2005, Abbas opposes violence and does not bend to outside pressure, offering his people a diplomatic struggle in parallel with peaceful resistance. He convinced the Palestinians that this way will result in international recognition of a Palestinian state, and he showed them the light at the end of the tunnel.

We may be "congratulating" ourselves for the diplomatic "victory" at the United Nations, but the Israel Defence Forces have likely not been so effusive. During consultations with Israel's political leadership, IDF generals expressed support for efforts to push for resuming negotiations, so that a confrontation might be averted on the ground. The IDF consider that cutting economic aid to the PA will bring about the breakdown of the security organizations there, and lead to anarchy in the West Bank.

Security co-ordination between Israeli and Palestinian officers continues, but one major problem remains – the confrontation between Palestinians and settlers.

The Palestinian appeal to the United Nations can – and should – be seen as an attempt to take a new direction, toward diplomacy rather than the violence that has previously proven so destructive and counterproductive.

The Palestinian petition to the UN will likely have a long-term impact. But dismissing it solely because it's a unilateral measure shows hypocrisy and blindness. What is building and expanding the settlements if not a unilateral step?

Failure to reach an agreement could result in the PA handing the keys of the West Bank to Israel, meaning the latter would be directly responsible for the welfare and policing of 2.5 million stateless Palestinians.

The "successful" Palestinian economy is an illusion, as the PA has received $10 billion (US) in donations since 2006. The West Bank does little in the way of exports and it does not have natural resources. As a result, a new intifadah is a real danger for Israel.

Controlling the West Bank is not Israel's inevitable destiny, but it has been an issue since 1967, evolving and expanding, becoming more sophisticated, preventing any real chance for peace.

Abbas accused Israel of having rejected numerous Palestinian proposals over the years regarding various final-status issues, saying that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had made negotiations impossible. Tellingly, former U.S. secretary of defence Robert Gates recently called Netanyahu "an ungrateful ally to the U.S. and a danger to Israel."

Old habits die hard. United in war we are, and sadly, just as divided in peace.

Arie Raif is an Israeli political activist and former diplomat. He is vice-chair of the Canadian Peres Center for Peace.

The ethics of language

Sara R. Horowitz

in Toronto

What would Raphael Lemkin think of "genocide"? Not the deed, which he found abhorrent. Not the word, which he himself coined in an effort to criminalize the act under international law. What would he think of "genocide" in quotations – that is, as misused in the discourse of those who twist its meaning and make unfounded accusations for political ends?

Sixty years ago, Lemkin came to North America as a Jewish refugee from Nazi-occupied Poland. Already in the early 1930s, before Hitler's rise to power, Lemkin understood that a crime without a name could not be fought, because it could not be identified. He grasped, as well, that the murder of a people was of a different level of magnitude than the murder of an individual, as terrible as that act is. Impelled by the Holocaust, which took the lives of most of his family and the majority of the Jews of eastern Europe, he spent his remaining years pushing for the recognition of his word – genocide – as a distinct category of crime condemned by international law.

Lemkin's efforts helped to bring Nazis to justice at the Nuremberg trials in the mid-1940s. Pushing through the first human-rights agreement at the United Nations, he set into motion the language and mechanisms to protect human rights under international law, and to hold perpetrators accountable.

Lemkin had faith in the power of language. He worked for clear and precise definitions to be given the force of law. With such focused dedication, he could not have foreseen the ways in which the language of human rights is often cravenly co-opted for inappropriate political purposes, to misinform, oversimplify, and distort. Language can serve to mask actual violations, and to promulgate a false perception of violations. We see this in the workings of the Durban conferences on racism, in the charges of Israel apartheid, in the choice to ignore some genocides, and on the general diffusion and misapplication of that term.

The constructive power of language is central in the Jewish tradition; creation, after all, happens through the divine word. Even more so, the tradition warns against its destructive capacity, which can be unleashed both deliberately and unknowingly, calculatedly and accidentally. True of the global theatre, it also operates locally, in communities, families, and other relationships.

The core component of the Yom Kippur liturgy – the Viddui, or confession that enumerates our failings – alerts us to the power and pitfalls of language. As we repeat it during the course of the fast day, we are reminded: more transgressions focus on speech and on the mouth/lips/tongue than on any other body part and function. The compendium of Jewish law on speech is elaborate and exacting, aimed at guarding against the damaging capability of language. Most notably, a 19th-century Lithuanian rabbi, Yisrael Meir Kagan – popularly known by the name of his most famous book, Chafetz Chaim, wrote extensively on the importance of vigilantly watching one's words.

Much as the force, proliferation and duration of speech concerned the Chafetz Chaim and other Jewish thinkers, they could not have imagined the power of modern technology. The Internet, with its instant accessibility and social media, amplifies speech indiscriminately and incessantly. We read of the vulnerability of teenagers who cannot bear assaults of web-bullying. Anyone, in fact, is open to damaging statements about their character in a medium that remains largely unaccountable for its contents.

Furthermore, the longevity of web pages and Facebook walls, and the recirculation of e-mails give all kinds of language not only a life but also an afterlife, as it were, on the web. So often, I am forwarded an e-mail alleging something terrible – an allegation discredited years ago, but unbeknownst to the person who has just uncovered it and forwarded it to 200 or 300 friends. What would the Chafetz Chaim have said about the Internet – he who is sometimes said to have advocated utter silence in order to "guard" one's speech?

As the Yom Kippur liturgy turns our thoughts inward and focuses us on language, let us challenge the best of our thinkers to develop a Jewish ethics for cyberspace no less elaborate and exacting than Lemkin's work on genocide or Chafetz Chaim's work on lashon hara (evil speech). It is our new frontier.

A very important book

Rabbi Dow Marmur

in Toronto

Unlike some rabbis, I've never been very enthusiastic about liturgical reform and always maintained that I could conduct Reform services from any Jewish prayer book. That's why I had no ambition to create alternative services in any of the congregations I served.

I don't believe that new prayer books bring in new worshippers. The best-attended synagogue services often use traditional, even archaic, texts. Ignorance of Hebrew hasn't stopped Jews from saying or chanting the words without understanding what they mean. Though intellectually problematic, it's traditionally sanctioned and existentially authentic.

As a result, I was never very happy with most of the innovations in the prayer books produced by the Reform movement. But, unlike some colleagues, I didn't engage in alternative "samizdat" publications, but used what was on offer. Even when I had reason to help shape services for special occasions, they were intended to supplement, not replace, standard texts.

But having just perused Siddur Pirchei Kodesh, the new prayer book of Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto to be formally launched at the Shabbat morning service on Oct. 29, I've changed my mind. The more than 600 pages of well-produced, readable text in Hebrew and English with insightful notes and wide-ranging commentaries make this a remarkable and very important book. It's very usable throughout the Jewish year (except the High Holidays) both at home and in synagogue.

Two of the guidelines listed in the introduction by the editor, Rabbi Yael Splansky, say it all: the desire to articulate the Temple's expression of Reform Judaism – nowadays on the conservative (small c) end of the spectrum – and to celebrate Holy Blossom's rich and varied history.

This mandate has liberated the editor and her committee from trying to cater to different trends, as the standard Reform liturgies tend to do, often turning prayer books into unwieldy anthologies. Siddur Pirchei Kodesh is intended for one congregation only. Everything about it reflects Holy Blossom Temple, its history and its philosophy.

The book was planned to celebrate the Temple's 150th anniversary some five years ago. With this in mind, it also includes a very readable brief history by Prof. Irving Abella. Illustrations and appendices reflect not only the congregation's significant past, but also testify to what it strives to be today.

Apart from the Hebrew texts and their English translations, many pages have pertinent and often pithy quotes from the Bible, Talmud and midrash, as well as the whole range of Jewish literature across the ages and current denominational divides. Members and non-members alike will find it a great resource, whether they'll use it for prayer, learning or inspiration.

Like Mishkan T'filah, the new prayer book of North America's Union for Reform Judaism, this siddur has been largely put together by women. In addition to Rabbi Splansky and the congregation's senior rabbi and cantor, the only two lay members of the committee were women.

It's an apt reflection of new trends in contemporary Jewish thought. They've opened our eyes to the reality of God, not as the masculine stereotype of power but as the ostensibly feminine manifestation of caring and nurturing. By taking us far beyond gender-sensitive translations, the book is a contemporary statement with important theological implications. Men, no less than women, will be moved by its warmth and its relevance.

Recognizing the difficulties that beset most people today when it comes to prayer, this book offers apt introductions to each section that set the texts in context. In this way, it becomes something of a handbook for Jewish living far beyond the confines of the synagogue. That's why it should find its place, if not by the bed then on the bookshelf, of every Jew, religious or secular, affiliated or not. Paradoxically, because it's specific, it's universal.

The above shouldn't be read as a promotional piece. I had nothing to do with the creation of the siddur and, as implied above, I might have even opposed it. Nor is it intended as a review, because I believe that all users should be its critics.

My aim is personal: I've a need to confess that, had I had a say, I'd probably have counselled against the publication of a book of this kind and found many excuses for my stance. Siddur Pirchei Kodesh has proven me wrong. Mercifully, I retired before I might have become an obstacle to its creation.

Synagogue is a symbol of renewal in Dresden

The New Synagogue in Dresden plans to mark its 10th anniversary on Nov. 9, a day of infamy in the annals of Germany's Jewish community. On that horrific date in 1938, Kristallnacht – a nationwide pogrom orchestrated by the Nazi regime – erupted.

In Dresden, an eastern German city of culture and industry and the capital of the state of Saxony, Kristallnacht also exacted a terrible toll. The 19th-century Semper Synagogue, an exemplar of Moorish Revival architecture, was destroyed by arson. As the historic building burned, a local firefighter, Alfred Neugebauer, plucked the shul's golden Star of David off the ground and hid it in his home.

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

Exactly 63 years later, in a sublime act of renewal, the New Synagogue, the first Jewish congregation to be built in eastern Germany since the Nazi era, was officially inaugurated in a solemn ceremony.

In a fitting gesture designed to link the past with the present, the sole remaining object from the Semper Synagogue, the Star of David that Neugebauer had retrieved, was installed above the entrance of the New Synagogue, an ultra-modern cube-like structure incorporating a community centre.

Paul Spiegel, the then chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, described its inauguration in glowing terms, saying its very existence was "a visible sign that, despite everything that has happened, there is Jewish life here again."

The construction of the New Synagogue, which is near the banks of the Elbe River and close to a busy ring road, was intrinsically part of a bigger process: the reconstruction of Dresden.

A humming metropolis of 500,000 with a profusion of exquisite baroque and rococo buildings, Dresden was firebombed by Britain and the United States in mid-February 1945, three months before Nazi Germany surrendered to the Allies. In two days of relentless bombing, about 25,000 civilians were killed as some of Dresden's finest structures – the Semper Oper and the Dresdner Frauenkirche – were demolished. As a U.S. prisoner of war, Kurt Vonnegut witnessed the devastating raids and immortalized them in his novel, Slaughterhouse Five.

By then, Dresden was virtually bereft of Jews, 2,500 having emigrated in the 1930s and early 1940s and the last few hundred having been deported in 1942.

Dresden was first settled by Jews in the 14th century. Massacres and expulsions followed, but Jews were permitted to return in the 18th century. Gottfried Semper, the famous architect, designed the Semper Synagogue, which opened in 1840. By the 1920s, the Jewish population was approximately 6,000.

Forty Jews, some of whom went into hiding in the first half of the 1940s, comprised Dresden's depleted Jewish community in the wake of World War II. During the Cold War period – when it was in East Germany and a KGB agent and future Russian president named Vladimir Putin was stationed here – Dresden was home to 200 known Jews.

Nora Goldenbogen

Among them was Raymond Anusiewicz, whose parents immigrated to France in 1933 and then lived in Chile, Argentina and Uruguay before returning to Dresden in 1949. Anusiewicz, who's Jewish on his father's side, works in the New Synagogue's Café Schoschana.

By 1989, on the eve of Germany's reunification, the Jewish population of Dresden had dwindled to 61. Nora Goldenbogen, born in 1949, was one of them.

Goldenbogen, since 2003, has been president of Dresden's Jewish community, which consists today of 710 members.

In keeping with recent immigration patterns, 95 per cent are from the former Soviet Union.

A teacher and a PhD in German history who specializes in the Thirty Years' War, she considers herself a German Jew, making her one of the relatively few Jews in Germany who hews to such an identity.

Goldenbogen's parents met in Paris in 1935, five days after Germany officially banned mixed marriages under the Nuremberg Laws. Her mother was a Romanian Jew, her father a German Christian.

Realizing that they had no future in Hitler's Germany, the young couple settled in Bucharest. During the Nazi occupation, she went into hiding, while he was imprisoned in the Sachsenhausen concentration camp. Sent off on a death march in 1945, he was saved by U.S. troops.

As Goldenbogen's parents were Communists, she was raised in an atheistic household. Nonetheless, she felt Jewish. "I'm a Jew by tradition, culture and history," said Goldenbogen, who was a member of the Communist party until East Germany's dissolution. "And I like the rituals of the synagogue."

Growing up Jewish in East Germany, she was considered "exotic." She experienced subtle antisemitism in the form of barbed stereotypes about Jews.

Apart from Goldenbogen, only three other members of the community were born and raised in Germany. The rest are Russians, who started settling in Germany at the end of the 1980s, when the Soviet Union began relaxing its immigration regulations.

Initially, the influx of Soviet Jews generated a measure of tension. German Jews like Goldenbogen felt pushed aside. But these hard feelings have dissipated.

Until 2001, the Jews of Dresden prayed in a compact whitewashed building in the Jewish cemetery, whose gravestones go back to the 19th century.

The "old" Jewish cemetery, brimming with weathered headstones whose inscriptions have mostly worn off or have been gouged out, is filled to capacity.

For the past decade, the Jews of Dresden have gathered at the New Synagogue, the stark interior of which is divided into sections by a gold metal mesh curtain.

The New Synagogue

It cost 11 million euros to build the shul, which is Conservative in orientation. Eight million euros were donated by Saxony and the municipality of Dresden in equal parts. The balance came from private overseas donors, mainly in the United States and Israel.

An itinerant rabbi who also administers to the needs of Jews in the nearby cities of Leipzig and Chemnitz (formerly Karl Marx Stadt) conducts services in the New Synagogue. According to Goldenbogen, the New Synagogue will have a dedicated rabbi in 2012. The adjacent community centre, constructed in the shape of a cube as well, houses a weekly Jewish school. The teacher is an Israeli.

Goldenbogen – a mother of two children whose Christian husband wants to convert to Judaism – admits that the growth of the community is a source of amazement and joy to her.

"I never thought it would happen. I hope it will be 'normal' to be Jewish in Dresden again. I'm optimistic about the future."

Her optimism may be misplaced. Since 2001, there have been only five weddings and two bar mitzvahs, she acknowledged.

The New Synagogue has not been subjected to vandalism, which perhaps explains why police are not constantly on guard here. But the neo-Nazi National Democratic Party has elected members of parliament in Saxony, a fact that Goldenbogen finds quite disquieting.

Baycrest Foundation head is readying her ship

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Susan Sutton, the new president of Baycrest Foundation, says that getting ready for a worldwide fundraising campaign is like readying a ship to circumnavigate the globe.

"We have to prepare the ship and get the staff on board," says Sutton, 52, who is originally from Colorado Springs, Colo.

Sutton spent 26 years leading campaigns for academic and health centres in the United States, most recently for nine years at Johns Hopkins Medical Centre in Baltimore, Md., where she completed a $2-billion campaign.

She recently came to Toronto to begin work at the Ontario College of Art and Design, she said, and shortly afterward was approached about the job at Baycrest.

"I'm not inclined to leave jobs, but I said I would take a look at the job description in order to refer other candidates. I noticed, however, that it was a perfect match for me, so I threw my hat into the ring.

"There are millions of great hospitals, but Baycrest is excellent for patient care and research. [The hospital] has the potential to transform on a global basis how we provide care, and I have the opportunity to make a huge impact."

Susan Sutton

She said that staff at Baycrest are aiming to practise "bench to bedside medicine. Research is applied directly to treat patients."

Baycrest's fundraising arm "is highly tuned and has a strong track record," Sutton said.

There are about 30 people in the department, she said, and after she started on Sept. 1, she spent about 45 minutes meeting with each one.

"[I discovered, for example] that the donation card office is very systematic. They are cognizant of the importance of recognizing people and sharing with them the impact of their gifts."

There is a strong historical relevance within the Jewish community for the work that is done at Baycrest, she said. "There is a palpable sense of how important the community is to Baycrest, and vice versa."

Sutton, who said moving to Toronto "was like landing in heaven," is now "preparing the ship. We will not even enter the quiet phase of the campaign for some time.

"We are intent on taking what has developed over the course of time, and not only improve on our care and service, but take what has been learned and share it globally."

Students pray for Schalit

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Students at three Canadian Jewish day schools – the Vancouver Hebrew Academy, Ottawa Jewish Community School and Toronto's Associated Hebrew Schools – prayed for Gilad Schalit and missing Israel Defence Forces soldiers on Oct. 5 as part of an international program, Tefilla For Gilad (tefillaforgilad.com).

Schalit, who was born in 1986, was abducted from his IDF unit by Hamas in June 2006.

As of Sept. 27, some four-dozen schools had signed up for the program, which is geared to Grade 7 and up. Three speakers participated by video conference: Nobel Peace Prize laureate Elie Wiesel, British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks and Rabbi Jonathan Rosenblatt, spiritual leader of the Riverdale Jewish Center in the Bronx, NY.

The initiative was organized in the last few weeks by Rabbi Joel Cohn, an educator and American oleh motivated by sadness that Schalit is still imprisoned and a desire to do something from a religious perspective, in light of the High Holidays.

Rabbi Cohn said in a phone interview that he has often passed the protest tent set up by Schalit's parents, Noam and Aviva, in 2009 across from the Israeli prime minister's residence in Jerusalem. The event was organized with the support of the Schalit family and will be broadcast from their tent.

The rabbi was gratified by the response he received from "many different types of schools, from left to right. It has been amazing to see." He cited schools in smaller Jewish communities such as Tulsa, Okla., and Birmingham, Ala., as well as in larger centres like New York and Chicago. A Jewish school in Amsterdam is also taking part.

Participating schools were requested to pre-register.

"We have a responsibility, each in our own way, to do what we can," Rabbi Cohn said.

Toronto teen sells cookies for Ve'ahavta

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Daniel Shade Silver, 15, is more than halfway to his goal of raising $3,600 for Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, by selling cookies as part of a school project.

The Grade 10 student at the York School was inspired by the night he spent two years ago, just before his bar mitzvah, distributing food and supplies to homeless people from a Ve'ahavta van.

The organization has two vans that are out five nights a week and have served more than 14,000 homeless people this year.

Shade Silver's experience on the van "kind of stayed with me," he said. "I wanted to give back to them." Money raised through his project will be used to fund Ve'ahavta's street van and provide supplies to homeless people.

He recalls being struck initially by the number of young people who lived on the street, and by the unlucky circumstances he heard about that led to their homelessness. According to Ve'ahavta statistics, forty-five per cent of homeless teens have run away because they've been attacked physically and/or emotionally.

The experience changed Shade Silver's view of homeless people and motivated him to want to help, he said.

A "Middle Years" personal project, a major work that is part of his school's International Baccalaureate program, provided the opportunity.

This summer, as part of the project, Shade Silver went out in the van twice more, sourced cookie suppliers, set up a website to sell cookies and accept donations, and has been working on a related essay, liaising with staff at Ve'ahavta as resources.

His Cookies for Kids program, which started in mid-September, ends Oct. 7. Shade Silver, an advanced math student who is thinking about a career in business, said he would be baking – or helping to bake – the cookies, under the supervision of Two Moms Baked Goods, a nut-free, kosher facility. Friends will help him package the cookies after school hours.

The price is $9 for 6 cookies. To simplify the baking process – and because Shade Silver figures that chocolate chip is the most popular type of cookie in the world – he decided that he would sell only chocolate chip cookies.

As of early last week, he had raised $2,900.

To access his website, go to veahavta.org, and click on current events.

Globe columnist just doesn't get it

Doug Saunders' column "A Palestinian state is Israel's best path to security" (Globe and Mail, Sept. 24) is one of those strange amalgams of fact, partial fact, and non-fact topped off by skewed interpretation that leaves one's mind reeling about how to sort it all out and set the record straight.

Saunders argues that the recent Palestinian effort to declare statehood at the United Nations (without negotiating an agreement with Israel) had a precedent over 60 years ago when Israel declared statehood following the General Assembly's 1947 Partition Resolution. He implies that if it was good enough for the Jews in the establishment of Israel, why shouldn't it be good enough for the Palestinians in the creation of their own state?

Saunders believes the two cases to be parallel ("strikingly similar circumstances" as he put it). This is his first major mistake. They are not parallel. In November 1947, following years of episodic Arab riots against Jewish immigration and rejection of previous British plans to divide Palestine west of the Jordan River, the UN General Assembly passed Resolution 181 calling for the creation of independent "Jewish" and "Arab" states. According to Saunders, however, since 181 also called for a (partial) economic union following partition, Saunders terms the intended result "one multiethnic nation with two internal states." This language appears nowhere in the partition resolution, but might well appeal to those advocating for a "bi-national" solution for Israelis and Palestinians.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Saunders writes that Resolution 181 "ended up producing more than 60 years of trouble," but he doesn't clearly explain why. True, he says that "Arab nationalists launched a war on the embryonic Israel." Yet he immediately "balances" that fact out by the far less accurate, unqualified claim that "radical Jewish nationalists pushed Arabs out of their homes and into the dwindling bits of Arab-designated territory."

What he doesn't properly explain, however, is why the Arabs launched the war in the first place. While the Jewish leadership accepted the partition plan, the Palestinian leadership and the Arab states vehemently rejected it, and in particular the creation of a distinct "Jewish" state. The Palestinians could have had their state at the time, but because they refused to compromise, they passed up that historic opportunity.

To this very day, the Jews' willingness to accept the historical compromise of a "Jewish" and an "Arab" state (now meaning a "Palestinian" state) has not been reciprocated by the Palestinians and the broader Arab world. Indeed, they continue to reject the idea of a "Jewish" state – the reason that "60 years of trouble" continues to plague the region.

In 1988, when the Palestinians (represented by the PLO) first declared unilateral statehood, they claimed to finally accept Resolution 181. However, they insisted that it was a historic injustice and demonized Israel. They declared that 181 provided them with the "legal" basis for their own state, but refused to extend that also to the "Jewish" state. In short, the Palestinians contradicted themselves by pretending to accept the partition plan, but only half of it. (The partition plan cannot be partitioned this way!)

Five years later, the overt anti-Israel vehemence of the Algiers declaration changed when, in his letter to then-Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin (a letter that launched the Olso process), then-PLO leader Yasser Arafat committed himself to recognizing the State of Israel. But he did not recognize Israel as the state of the Jewish people. After all, he later insisted that the Palestinian refugees and their descendants have a "right of return" to Israel, which would eventually make Israel another Arab country.

It was Arafat's refusal (as well as Abbas') to accept Israel's Jewish character and relinquish the "right of return" that caused the collapse of Camp David, and later kept Abbas from replying to Ehud Olmert's offer of Palestinian statehood in 2008. Yet Saunders blames "Israeli domestic politics" instead for causing the negotiating process to break down.

To put this in straightforward terms, Saunders does not grasp the core of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

Who shall live and who shall die

"On New Year's Day the decree is inscribed/ And on the Day of Atonement it is sealed/ How many shall pass away and how many shall be born/ Who shall live and who shall die." [http://bit.ly/tokef4]

They are perhaps the most moving words of the High Holiday services. The Unetaneh Tokef prayer is recited on Rosh Hashanah and then again on Yom Kippur. In startling detail, it tells how our fate is inscribed and sealed during these Days of Awe – and lists in detail the destiny that may await us over the coming year. Despite the horrors mentioned, the poem continues to grip worshippers and composers centuries after it was written.

Although there are questions about its authorship, Unetaneh Tokef is attributed to Rabbi Amnon who lived in Mainz, Germany, about 1,000 years ago. [http://bit.ly/tokef3] Rabbi Amnon had been repeatedly summoned by the bishop to convert to Christianity. Eventually, the bishop had Rabbi Amnon's hands and feet cut off for refusing. According to tradition, after Rabbi Amnon died of his injuries, he appeared in a dream to Rabbi Kalonymous and taught him the prayer. [http://bit.ly/tokef2]

Piyut.org.il is the single best place to hear how these lyrics have been rendered by various composers including:

- Persian, Yemenite and chassidic versions
- The great Cantor Yossele Rosenblatt
- Yair Rosenblum's remarkable, contemporary and at times upbeat version. Rosenblum was musical director of the Israel Defence Forces in the 1960s and '70s. He composed his version in memory of 11 soldiers from Kibbutz Beit Hashitah who fell during the 1973 Yom Kippur war. [http://bit.ly/tokef5] (Click on "More Renditions" to see all the choices.)

Speaking of contemporary, a version of Unetaneh Tokef entered

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

popular culture when Leonard Cohen released the song Who By Fire. [http://bit.ly/tokef11]

"And who by brave assent, who by accident,/ who in solitude, who in this mirror,/ who by his lady's command, who by his own hand,/ who in mortal chains, who in power,/ and who shall I say is calling?"

Cohen explained that he derived his song "from the melody which I heard when I sat in a synagogue. And of course the ending of my song is something different. Who shall I say is calling? This is my kind of prayer: Who is it, or what is it, which determines man's life?" [http://bit.ly/tokef12]

Rabbi Daniel Landes suggests that Unetaneh Tokef is somewhat of a paradox. "We enter the prayer reluctantly knowing that it contains harsh judgments about the reality of our lives because it speaks about how life passes very quickly. But somehow we emerge drained but at the same time uplifted." [http://bit.ly/tokef8]

And in his commentary on Unetaneh Tokef in his Rosh Hashanah machzor, British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks explores why a poem that may initially seem morbid is in fact life affirming. (To read more by Rabbi Sacks, go to: [http://bit.ly/tokef9] and search for "tokef.")

"Then comes the great outburst of faith that defines Judaism as a religion of hope. No fate is final. Repentance, prayer and charity can avert the evil decree... God forgives, God pardons, God exercises clemency – if we truly repent and pray and give to others."

Synagogue dues and don'ts

Growing up, I repeatedly told my parents that I would not join a synagogue when I was older. I was not rebelling against religious practices or expressing a desire to disassociate from Jewish life. Rather, I was repelled by the commoditization of religious affiliation. While I recognized that throughout history Jews and other religionists have paid taxes and alms to support religious apparatus, High Holidays tickets and membership dues irked me.

I thought of High Holiday tickets as the most nefarious. Tickets play to market forces, raising the price of admission when demand is high and supply scarce. Similarly, buying a ticket for Yom Kippur services seems to put a price tag on tshuva, repentance. While I recognize that tzedakah is a key element of the process of introspection, tickets are rarely framed in the context of charity.

On Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, days that should be used for engaging the under-engaged and lowering barriers for entrance to the synagogue, ticket prices are hurdles for the unaffiliated. Notwithstanding subsidies and reductions in prices, I wonder how many Jews do not come to synagogue on the High Holidays because of ticketing.

Shortly after getting married, my wife and I received our first synagogue dues statement. $1,200. We had sticker shock. As regular synagogue attendees, we recognized the value and importance of supporting the shul, but $1,200 seemed beyond the pale. While the dues statement clearly stated, "finances should not be a barrier for membership," we were not looking for a subsidy or handout, merely an assessment commensurate with our means and stage in life.

We surveyed friends to learn about student and young-adult pricing at their synagogues. Policies vary. Some synagogues assess dues based on income; others based on age, student status, family size or years married. Most do have some form of graduated pricing. Back at our synagogue, we asked our friends about their membership status. Several agreed that they, too, were hesitant to ask for a reduction in fees and therefore had not yet joined the synagogue.

A graduated dues structure is an investment in future affiliation. Lessons can be learned from banks that offer free student accounts and newspapers that reduce student subscription rates. These companies are banking on the "stickiness" of affiliation to sustain the relationship beyond the discounted period. By lowering barriers for membership early on and allowing young members to pay a pre-determined reduced fee, synagogues can showcase the benefits of membership and, hopefully, build lifelong members.

As often happens, the zeal of my youth has been tempered by experience. Having served as a lay leader of several synagogues, I recognize that money needs to be raised and bills need to be paid. Voluntary donations don't suffice and passing the plate on Shabbat morning isn't a good option. After my research, we have begun to work with our synagogue to construct tiered dues for young members. When my wife and I pay our synagogue dues, we have a sense that we are contributing to a community grounded in common values and supporting an institution in which we are invested.

The surprising appeal of Kol Nidre

Lawrence A. Hoffman
JTA

Guest Voice

Before converting to Christianity, philosopher Franz Rosenzweig attended Yom Kippur services and was so moved that he decided to remain Jewish. One look at the most famous prayer of that day makes it hard to believe that he did not abandon Judaism more quickly.

Kol Nidre actually is no prayer. It's a legal formula in Aramaic that delineates obscure categories of vows and oaths known to the Bible and the rabbis. It then solemnly proclaims that we are free of them.

The origin of this concern was our ancestors' anxiety over reneging on promises sworn in God's name. The Talmud permitted such oaths to be cancelled, but only one by one in the presence of a talmudic sage. The idea of a blanket nullification was denounced as "a foolish custom" by rabbis in the eighth and ninth centuries. But no one listened.

It is thus a superstition-laden prayer that was condemned by rabbinic authorities but stuck anyway. Its final version reflects a 12th-century substitution of "vows made in the future" for "vows made in the past," so as to do away with its obvious disregard for talmudic law. Even so, it hardly represented Judaism at its moral best. In the 19th century it fuelled German antisemitism to the point where Jews were hauled into court and forced to swear that they would be answerable for the truth of any oath they took there.

Still, Kol Nidre persisted, eventually supplied with unforgettable music and the choreography of a courtroom trial held before God. Jews were chanting it as far back as 11th-century France. Polish Rabbi Mordecai Jaffe (1530–1612) sought in vain to change the text because cantors resisted coupling the age-old melody with new lyrics. Nineteenth- and 20th-century rabbis tried to substitute Psalms or write a new prayer altogether.

What attracts us to this strangely haunting ritual? Is it the music? Surely. Is it also the high drama of the occasion – Torah scrolls dressed in white and held in full view of the congregation throughout the chant? Yes. But it is more. "All these vows: Kol nidre" assembles the thoughtful and moving answers of rabbis and cantors, artists and thinkers the world over. My view is that Kol Nidre connects us with the sacred.

Since the 19th century, we have been moving toward greater secularity – not necessarily a bad thing, if by "secular" we mean the discovery that the world is devoid of magical forces and everything runs by an immutable set of scientific laws. But a universe that operates by natural law can still have mystery. We strive to be secular, scientific and savvy without giving up on God and the certainty that life still matters. On Kol Nidre eve, energy runs high, memories go deep and some things seem not to have changed in 1,000 years or more.

People mistakenly think they cannot pray because they cannot believe. The reverse is true. Prayer compels belief, not the other way around. For a brief moment, as Kol Nidre is chanted, we are in touch with the sacred and with our finitude, with those we love and with the broader human universe, with our own better selves and with the God we are not even sure we believe in.

Rabbi Lawrence A. Hoffman, a professor at Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion, is the author of All These Vows: Kol Nidre (Jewish Lights).

God watches over us

I often delight in hugging my children. These are special moments where we bond in an embrace of security and comfort.

Our daughter, Keren, sometimes runs into my arms when she is being "attacked" by her siblings. This refuge of love and support is a natural thing. Moreover, this requirement is not confined to children alone. Adults, too, need to be heard and supported. We also need someone to be there for us.

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Our rabbis teach that we have Someone who is constantly tending to us. Our Father in heaven is here for us at every moment.

Our Torah tells us that God protected us Jews when we left Egypt. In a famous passage, the Talmud (Sukkah 11a) cites a disagreement between Rabbi Akiva and Rabbi Eliezer, the former saying God protected us by building sukkot and the latter saying God protected us by providing the clouds of glory for our journey. Whatever opinion we prefer, God's protection of us is beyond question.

The root of the Hebrew word Sukkah is the same as lehistochech, which means to be covered, to be protected. The kabbalists teach that, even though the sukkah is built outside the warmth and comfort of our regular house, there is a Divine Light surrounding our shelter. We see that God is close – always.

Historically, this concept is relevant to the Jewish People. Even in the darkest moments of humanity, when things appear so foreboding and uncertain, there is light at the end of the tunnel – and, often, closer.

We live in a very challenging world. The economy is in the doldrums, life is expensive and it's hard to earn a livelihood. Turmoil seems ubiquitous, with dictators threatening the civilized world. Too often, despair would seem to trump hope.

As Jews, we must believe, always, that there is hope, and the holiday of Sukkot reminds us of this. For we are the children of God, each one of us "wrapped" in God's warm embrace. After all, He is our refuge of love, hope, and protection in good times and bad times – not the house!

Sometimes we come to understand subsequently why we have challenges. I remember when I was seeking to get married. It was a difficult time – I had just lost my father, and it seemed as if there was no one out there who was quite right for me.

I remember a conversation I had with my rabbi at the time, when he assured me that it would happen and exhorted me to keep on praying to God and to have faith. Later I understood through prayer and perseverance why I had to go through this rough time.

At last, I met my wife, the greatest blessing in my life.

Our sages say that on Yom Kippur, we become as close to God as angels when we approach this day with the proper posture.

As we near the Day of Atonement and then Sukkot, let us strive to understand through prayer and mitzvot that, despite the transiency and hurdles of life, God is watching over us, has bequeathed to each a unique mission, and has abounding love for us all.

The call of my teens: the shofar

Baruch Cohen
In loving memory of beloved Malca

Within the little synagogue
The light is slim
The air is hushed around,
The silence seems to pray
We hear the Shofar sound!

O Shofar!
Tell us we need not fear,
Though long and hard the way
O Shofar!
Bind us with thy holy strain
'Til each young heart shares in Israel's pain
And like a trumpet clear,
Sound to the entire world the vow
The strangest vow aneu:
To bear with pride the name of Jew
Throughout the endless years!

Jaslo, Poland boasted a Jewish population of 3,000 leading up to the Second World War. In 1905 the Great Synagogue of Jaslo was the heart and soul of Jewish life in the community. Tragically the building and its community were destroyed in 1939.

For more than ten years the Temmy Latner Forest Hill Jewish Centre has served the Jewish community of the neighbourhood. The Centre has become an anchor for Jewish life in the area. Jaslo like hundreds of "forgotten communities" will be celebrated in this unique facility offering a wide range of educational programs and services that answer the many needs of Jewish Life today.

Jewish-Haitian ties highlighted during festival

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The already cordial relations between Montreal's Jewish and Haitian communities are being further strengthened this month during the 10th annual Mois du Créole à Montréal.

Honey Dresher, a past president of the Saidye Bronfman Centre and host for many years of the Jewish Program on CFMB radio, is the honorary president of this celebration of the Creole language and culture at events throughout October.

This rare honour to someone outside the community caps the more than a decade Dresher has spent working with Haitian and other Creole-speaking people on joint projects. She's also formed some strong friendships with members of that community.

Dresher is a veteran in the promotion of the understanding of cultural diversity in Quebec, especially through broadcasting and the arts.

She was the producer of Woumble/Farbrengen: A Celebration of Friendship, an original musical and spoken word show in Creole, Yiddish, French and English, presented by Jewish and Haitian performers at the Montreal International Yiddish Theatre Festival in June. It recalled the two people's historic suffering, but emphasized the strength they have drawn through a devotion to their traditions and homeland.

The Segal Centre is a sponsor of Mois du Créole, as is the Israeli consulate.

The exhibition Israeli Heroes in Haiti was shown at the official launch of the month, held at Montreal City Hall. These 10 photos by Joe Shalmoni depict compassionate scenes of Israeli health-care and rescue workers aiding victims of the devastating earthquake Haiti suffered in January 2010. It's noted that Israel immediately sent 250 doctors, nurses and emergency specialists to Haiti after the catastrophe.

The exhibition was previously on view at the Segal during the Yiddish festival.

On Oct. 9, the Segal will host a Mois du Créole event: the screening of three films from 3-9 p.m. Manno Charlemagne: Konviksyon, a documentary on Haitian musician Emmanuel Charlemagne; De Meringue à Compas direct, about Haitian music in the 1940s (both in Creole and directed by Montrealer Frantz Voltaire); and L'Autre by Radu Juster, the Romanian-born Montreal filmmaker and architect.

At the launch, Dresher wished the month's organizers a "yasher koach" in Hebrew, and, testing her still-uncertain Creole, she said, "Ayibobo pou mwa kreyòl la; Ann kolé zèpol ak zèpol" ("Let us pay tribute to the Mois du Créole. Let's stand together.")

Choreographer Eddy Toussaint and Honey Dresher pose in front of the exhibition Israeli Heroes in Haiti at the launch of Mois du Créole.

She expressed her admiration for the creative talent in the Creole community of Quebec in the arts and literature. She urged Montrealers of all origins to take part in the month's activities, which include theatre, music, dance, visual arts, literature and gastronomy.

Margaux Chetrit, cultural affairs attachée at the Israeli consulate, said the rapport between the two communities is a natural one because of their shared love of life despite exile and oppression.

Jews also remember that it was Haiti, a poor country of less than three million people, that offered to take in up to 50,000 Jewish refugees from Europe in the 1930s, when western countries closed their doors. Despite obstacles placed by the United States, Haiti provide a haven for several hundred fleeing Jews.

These facts were highlighted in the exhibition Jews and Haitians: A Forgotten History, created by the local Haitian and Jewish communities and mounted at Federation CJA, soon after the earthquake.

Besides Haiti, Creole, a French-based language, is spoken in Guadeloupe, Martinique, Dominica, the Seychelles, Mauritius, St. Lucia, French Guyana and elsewhere. It is estimated that more than 200,000 Canadians, mostly in Quebec, can speak it.

Montreal woman found murdered in New Jersey

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Friends and family were raising money via Facebook prior to Rosh Hashanah to return the body of a Jewish woman to Montreal for burial after she was found murdered in New Jersey.

Amanda "Randy" Lehrer

Amanda "Randy" Lehrer, 32, was discovered Sept. 23 encased in concrete in a 55-gallon drum in the basement of her apartment building in Jersey City, N.J., three days after she was reported missing by her husband Steven Acuna, 38.

She was reportedly strangled.

Acuna was arrested for his wife's murder the day after her body was found.

Lehrer's cousin, Jessica Shirin, told Global News after Lehrer disappeared in mid-August that the couple fought often because Acuna was unemployed, and she was afraid of his physical and verbal abuse.

Lehrer, who had moved to New Jersey several years ago and was working as a waitress, grew up in St. Laurent and attended the École Sépharade de Montréal.

She was reported to have last travelled to Montreal, where she came fairly regularly, in late July with her husband and 11-month-old baby daughter, Stephanie – now one year old – for a "family reunion."

Lehrer was last seen Aug. 12 in Jersey City.

On the Facebook page set up to raise funds to return her body to Montreal for burial, a friend who went to school with Lehrer, Michal Bouganim, said: "I can't believe what I'm reading here, we went to [École] Sépharade together and we were best friends.

(By last Sunday, in fact, Lehrer's body was returned to Montreal and buried).

"We lost touch in high school and I moved to live in Israel. [A] few months ago we found each other on Facebook, and she had told me that she had a beautiful little girl and that she's so happy to be a mom!

"I'm in total shock."

Lehrer's mother, Rose (Shoshana) Moncarz, of Cote St. Luc, was quoted as saying that she would be seeking to raise her daughter's baby.

"I want my granddaughter here with us," she told Postmedia News. "She deserves to be loved.

"[My daughter] was always trying to do better in life, but she married a loser – I don't know what she saw in him."

There was no answer at the Moncarz home when called by The CJN.

Moncarz reportedly identified her daughter's body from a tattoo on her right shoulder that read: "Laugh now, cry later."

גמר חתימה טובה חברים, בריאות ושלוות נפש לכם ולשלכם.

Shabbat library opening not under consideration

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Opening the Jewish Public Library (JPL) on Shabbat is not being considered, its new executive director Michael Crelinsten confirmed.

The question has been on many people's minds since the Ben Weider YM-YWHA, of which Crelinsten was previously executive director, decided to extend its hours to Saturdays two years ago.

"There is no thought of opening on Saturday. Nobody has given any indication of any intention to open on Shabbat," Crelinsten said in an interview, nor of extending the schedule later than the year-round 1 p.m. closing on Fridays.

However, Crelinsten said he would like to see the JPL's hours expanded during the week between Sunday and Thursday, but at the present time there is no budget to allow it.

The JPL's finances and its adaptation, like all libraries, to new technology are Crelinsten's preoccupations as he takes over the top job from Eva Raby, who retired after almost three decades with the JPL.

In recent years, Raby coped with serious budget cuts by Federation CJA, on which the JPL relies for half its revenue, resulting in a reduction in staff and the year-round schedule, and greater dependence on private fundraising.

Crelinsten said the lead-up to the JPL's 100th anniversary in 2014 is an occasion to raise money to ensure its future. He stressed that the JPL remains "financially viable, but it's not going to get any easier."

Crelinsten, a Jewish community professional since the mid-1980s, has held senior positions at the Y Country Camp, Canadian Jewish Congress, Federation CJA, and for the past 4-1/2 years directed the Y.

He possesses no library background, other than a love of books and reading. What he brings is his management ability and community experience, he said.

"We have a very competent staff with very strong library skills," he said, adding that, being short-staffed, all are working extra hard. And the JPL has earned an international reputation.

"My most immediate challenge is to learn," Crelinsten acknowledged.

At the 97th annual general meeting, the beloved Raby was given a fond and suitably irreverent sendoff. The highlight was a wickedly funny routine by Eddie Paul, head of bibliographic and information services. "The Hidden Biography" compared the respective career paths and relationships of Raby and Mick Jagger, since they attended the London School of Economics (LSE) in 1963.

Ultimately, Jagger, the LSE dropout, received a knighthood from Prince Charles; Raby, with her master's degree, the 2011 Anne Galler Award for Outstanding Library Service from the Quebec Library Association, Paul deadpanned.

There is no evidence they ever met, Paul continued, and the only time she was known to have uttered "Can't get no satisfaction" is after returning from a federation budget meeting.

Paul topped it off by donning a pair of large, furry hand puppets in a nod to Raby's renowned rapport with kids. Other staff thoughtfully dug up a recording she made of Old MacDonald Had a Farm – in Yiddish with all the animal sounds in high fidelity.

Raby became JPL executive director in 2000, after 17 years as head of the JPL's Norman Berman Children's Library. During that time, the children's section grew significantly in size, activities and participation, with Raby reaching out to all Montreal children. Before, she was a librarian at McGill University for 13 years and two years at Vanier College.

Jewish women comics have evolved: expert

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — By day, Steven Bergson works as a research administrator at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

But when he's not at work, Bergson, a librarian by training, is a maven and amateur historian of Jewish books – more accurately, Jewish comic strips and books, Jewish humour books and Jewish graphic novels.

Bergson's expertise and research thoroughness were clear earlier this year at a convention of North American Jewish libraries in Montreal, where he presented a thorough – if somewhat dry – overview of the presence and depiction of Jewish women in North American comic strips, books and other publications (not to be confused with Jewish comic books by Jewish women, which are appearing in increasing numbers).

Bergson's presentation included images from the obscure to the ubiquitous.

The Jewish female presence in graphic form, he noted, goes back more than 70 years – to the 1940s, he noted in his talk and states in his blog on the subject, jewishwomenincomix.blogspot.com.

"My personal comic collection is not comprehensive, and I've tried to select examples which are the best looking and most interesting," he wrote in the blog.

The comic book industry has had its ups and downs over the decades, but syndicated comic strips have endured, he said.

The presence of Jewish women in comic strips and books, Bergson believes, has been influenced in varying degrees by the feminist movement, the rise to prominence of women in magazine publishing and the comic book industry and their inclusion as identifiably Jewish characters in literature.

During the 1940s, Jewish women were primarily depicted in adaptations, such as Rebecca in a Classics comic book version of the Sir Walter Scott novel Ivanhoe. Rebecca is "the daughter of Isaac the Jew," a character, Bergson said, was inspired by the 19th-century American educator Rebecca Gratz.

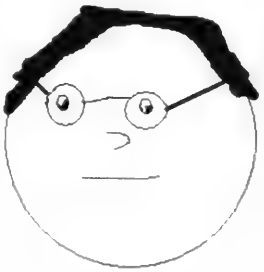
There would be numerous adaptations of Ivanhoe in comic book form over the ensuing decades, mostly the 1950s, '60s and '70s, as well as adaptations of biblical stories with the characters Ruth and Queen Esther.

Bergson is good at rooting out covertly Jewish characters. In a 1950s "romance comic" called Different written by Jack Kirby and Joe Simon, who were both Jewish, a female protagonist and her family are shunned because they were "different" from the townspeople, perhaps because they are Jewish.

"Even if the fictional family was not meant to be Jewish," Bergson's blog says, "it's reasonable to assume that the story was written because [the authors] were supportive of interfaith relationships.

In terms of the depictions of Jewish women, things began to evolve in earnest in the 1960s, with the first comic book with a Jewish female protagonist in stories based on the Golem, and even an irreverent one-page comic with a female Jewish madam named Fanny Hillman.

Jewish female characters popped up in a Superman "backup" story (an action comic in which Superman appears as opposed to a Superman comic) called My Son, The Orphan. Then Jewish female characters began to appear in a myriad of publications, among them Holocaust resistance stories, war stories with Holocaust survivors, Captain America, and the first Jewish graphic novel, A Contract With God (1978), with, in Bergson's words, "significant Jewish women."



Caricature of Steven Bergson

In 1975's Die Bubbeh comic book, Sharon Rudahl relates the true tale of her grandmother secretly taught how to read in three languages amid pogroms in her shtetl.

The most arguably popular Jewish superhero in history, Kitty Pride, appears during the 1980s with her Magen David necklace, while Jewish female characters appear in most recent years – both prominently and less so – in Hex, Spiderman, Greenberg the Vampire, Captain America, National Lampoon, Will Eisner's The Life Force, Art Spiegelman's masterpiece Maus, X-Men and many more.

Among prominent Jewish characters in comics in the most recent years, Bergson said, are Sabra in Marvel Comics, Judith, a member of the Hayoth team in DC Comics, Masada in Image Comics and Golani in Archie Comics.

Perhaps the best-known current Jewish graphic novel with a female Jewish protagonist, he said, is Barry Deutsch's Hereville.

Library gets new president

"Eva is strong-minded but soft-spoken, confident but considerate, serious but good-humoured," said outgoing president Gerry Soiferman, who admired her enthusiasm in everything she did.

The JPL's new president is Alain Murad.

As her son, Benjy, a doctor in Boston, noted, Raby "was born for the job," coming from a family with a long history of literary, intellectual and Jewish cultural engagement. Her maternal grandmother was a publisher of Yiddish books in Vilna, and the home of her parents, Masha and Leo Roskies, who immigrated in 1941, was a mecca for community luminaries.

Raby responded that her unexpected 28-year career with the JPL was probably fated, after years not in the midst of the rich Jewish life in which she grew up.

She, the first of the Roskies children to be born in Canada, decided to take a different course than her older siblings, the late Benjamin Roskies and Ruth Wisse, now a professor of Yiddish literature at Harvard University, who followed in their parents' pursuit of Yiddishkeit as scholars. Raby wanted to explore the wider world.

Although she was an experienced librarian, Raby admitted she knew little about running a children's library when she started in 1983, except that she had loved reading to her two children. Raby soon became an accomplished storyteller and "a ham, as in acting" with her young charges.

Likewise, she had to learn on the job how to be a CEO when she rose to executive director.

"I guess I needed a journey away from this [Jewish] world, in order to come back to it," Raby said.

Constellation of Distinction

We'd like to invite you to join us in forming our prestigious, new Constellation of Distinction. This is your opportunity to count yourself among the tradition of bright stars shining at Mount Sinai Hospital by making a contribution in support of our highest priority needs.

Mount Sinai Hospital is home to stars of medicine and science. Stars in their field devoted to the best in patient care, groundbreaking research and teaching the next generation of clinicians and researchers. But the brightest stars of all are our valued donors, whose collective support provides the funds that have enabled Mount Sinai Hospital to become a world-class leader in health care.

EVERY donor who contributes, at any level, to this campaign will be acknowledged as an inaugural member of the Constellation of Distinction and recognized for their leadership and generosity. Those who make a very special gift of $2,500 or more will have their name listed on a new plaque to be dedicated this spring on the main floor of the Hospital where it will remain for a full year before being relocated to another prominent area for permanent recognition.

Your support of our highest priorities is critical to helping fuel Mount Sinai Hospital's world-renowned research and to providing new equipment that will ensure the very best in patient care.

EVERY gift is important… and with your help Mount Sinai Hospital will shine even brighter!

It would be our privilege to honour you as part of this very special community of donors. To donate, please visit BrighterTogether.ca or call 416-586-8203.

Federation president pledges affordable schooling

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — "We are not a community of institutions. We are a community of people. People who are devoted, caring, passionate and committed to our community and all it stands for," Jack Hasen, outgoing Federation CJA president stated at the organization's 94th annual general meeting Sept. 19.

"The reality is that at this very moment we are all the beneficiaries of community, its leadership and people who have created the city with the highest quality of Jewish life anywhere in North America."

This vision came out of the federation's Imagine 2020 initiative, through which people representing the diversity of the Montreal Jewish community shared their aspirations for the future.

The responsibility now lies with new federation president David Cape and new first vice-president Susan Laxer to continue to implement a strategic plan for the community over the next two years.

"Jack Hasen leaves us with a great legacy. Imagine 2020 serves as our road map," said Cape, who was one of many speakers praising the leadership of Hasen. "We are making groundbreaking advances with our day-school system and Federation CJA is opening itself up to every corner of our community. Jack has set us on this mission of becoming the city with the highest quality of Jewish life in North America and we will get there."

Cape highlighted his priorities for his two-year mandate: making Jewish schools accessible and affordable to every Jewish child; providing opportunities to youth so that they remain in Quebec and continue to build the Jewish community; working with donors so that they understand how important legacy gifts are to ensuring the continuing strength of the community.

"We have a great community. We are blessed with great institutions, schools, synagogues, hospitals – the list is endless," said Cape on stage with Laxer. "But our people make the difference. There is passion and commitment. Susan and I feel it and it gives us energy. We will not let you down."

The AGM was the first major function for CEO Deborah Corber, who took the professional helm of federation Sept. 6.

"I view the chance to serve as CEO of Federation CJA as, quite literally, the opportunity of a lifetime," she said. "And, while I recognize that I have a steep learning curve ahead of me, there are a few things that I already know to be true.

"I know that our community is comprised of people with different backgrounds who all have their own perspectives and points of view, but I also know that we are all united in our desire to ensure that Jewish Montreal has a bright and sustainable future."

Several leaders were presented with awards honouring them for their dedication and commitment to Jewish Montreal. Charles Bronfman presented longtime philanthropist Arnold Steinberg with the federation's most prestigious award, Samuel Bronfman Medal.

Students taught how to defend Israel

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — When Marian Pinsky, a Bialik High School graduate, entered McGill University, she felt the shock of being in an environment where Israel was frequently the target of criticism and attack.

Most disturbing for her was that it generally went unanswered. Despite her passion for Israel, she didn't feel equipped to respond effectively to Israel's detractors.

Two years ago, she learned of a well-structured, academic-oriented program for CEGEP and university students like her.

The Student Israel Advocacy Program (SIAP) was developed by the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR), an independent think-tank headed by Concordia University professor Frederick Krantz.

SIAP, which is being offered again for a fourth year, from October through April, is a series of seminars led mainly by Concordia professors on Jewish and Zionist history and modern-day Israel and the Middle East politics, as well as antisemitism.

"Drawing on both primary and secondary documents, it provided me with a comprehensive overview of both the past and present situation, as well as critical talking points to counter accusations and demand a more balanced perspective of a complex and nuanced situation," said Pinsky, who is now a master's student in sociology at Concordia.

Almost as important as the knowledge she acquired, Pinsky says SIAP gave her the confidence to defend and promote Israel. The program includes practical instruction in writing, speaking and organizing skills. The students tested those skills out with an actor who pretended to be an aggressive critic of Israel.

In fact, Pinsky says SIAP transformed her from being merely a concerned supporter of Israel to a campus activist. She recently became editor of Dateline: Middle East, the student-run periodical published by CIJR.

"I think the most critical thing that SIAP provide students with, above and beyond the opportunity to meet with experts in the field, was a support network and community," Pinsky added. "This is so critical, especially as pro-Israel students can often feel outnumbered and alienated on campus."

She is among the founders last year of the Zionist Youth Network, a grassroots group of pro-Israel students.

For the first time, students can earn three tutorial credits if they complete SIAP, said Krantz. The credits will be issued by the university for which they write the final paper.

"SIAP gives students the knowledge and skills they need to defend Israel and Jews, in the face of deepening antisemitism and delegitimization of Israel," he said

Speaking up for Israel is increasingly being hindered on North American campuses, he said, by "selectively restrictive speech codes" and "the sometimes intimidating abuse of professorial authority."

This year's SIAP, on the theme "Taking Back the Campus," comprises sessions held roughly every three weeks at the CIJR office on downtown Ste. Catherine Street from 5:30 to 7:30 p.m.

Krantz said arrangements are being made to transmit SIAP sessions by Skype to the University of Manitoba, through Prof. Catherine Chatterley, director of the Canadian Institute for the Study of Antisemitism, and possibly to other universities in Toronto and Ottawa.

More information is available on CIJR's newly revamped website, www.isranet.org.

Serve sushi after the Yom Kippur fast

By Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

Breaking the fast after Yom Kippur is the most anticipated meal of the year. Of course, it's because we're starving – we've been fantasizing about that first bite for the last 25 hours.

So, as soon as the sun goes down, the shofar is blown for the last time and we wish each other Shanah Tovah, our thoughts invariably turn to – how can we get to that buffet table in the quickest amount of time?

How's this for a novel idea? Sushi, Asian Cole slaw and cold avocado-cucumber soup.

This perfect post-fast meal was the brain child of sushi chef Tracy Griffith, whose recipes are easy to digest and high in water content – exactly what our body needs after a day with no sustenance.

"Breaking the Fast with sushi is not only easy on our digestive systems, it's a treat to our weary eyes. We eat first with our eyes," says Griffith, who has catered many a break-the-fast meal. The talented chef, author of Sushi, American Style (Clarkson Potter), convinces us that, yes, we too can conquer the art of making sushi rice and dressing.

SUSHI RICE WITH RICE DRESSING

If you think you'll make sushi more than once, Griffith emphasizes the importance of purchasing a rice cooker. "This is the first and most important step in the sushi-making process," she says. "If your rice is tasty, your sushi will shine." Makes about 6 cups cooked rice.

Cold avocado-cucumber soup

3 cups short-grain white sushi rice
3 to 3 1/2 cups of water

Pour rice into a freestanding wire-mesh sieve. Under cold water, gently swish rice around with your fingers until water runs almost clear, about 1 minute. To dry, fan rice up and around sides of sieve, exposing it to the air. Let sit until completely dry, about 30 minutes. (This step may be done in the morning so that when you get home you can begin cooking rice immediately.)

Place rice and water in a 4- to 6-cup rice cooker and click to "Cook" setting. Most of the machines will turn off automatically and alert you that the rice is ready.

Do not open lid. Let rice rest untouched for 15 minutes – this steaming time is essential to the rice's success.

With a rice paddle, scoop hot rice from cooker insert and spread out evenly over bottom of a large shallow wooden bowl or a large glass baking dish. Holding paddle perpendicularly over rice, drizzle rice dressing (recipe below) over back of paddle, evenly covering rice's surface. Fold dressing through the rice until grains are coated and glossy.

Place dressed sushi rice back into cooker, cover with a clean, damp kitchen towel to keep in moisture. Click cooker button onto the "Warmer" setting.

Sushi rice is easier to handle when it's warm; it also tastes better.

In loving memory of our beloved daughter,
Stacey Louise Baer
(Jan. 18, 1971 – Oct 11, 2004)
In the end, we all give the world three things:
We give it our labour-whatever it is we do, no matter how humble, that makes us an asset, rather than a liability to the planet.
We give it our example-how we live, love, and handle both acclaim and adversity.
Most of all, we give it our children-the greatest expression of faith and hope there is.
So today, for this Thanksgiving weekend, when most of our tomorrows seem unbearable without her, we remember our Stacey-her courage, her spirit, and most of all, her joy.
Forever in our hearts, love, Mom, Dad and Jenn

Soup full of nutritious veggies

Rice Dressing

The sweet vinegar dressing used on sushi rice is called sushi-zu and is the secret to its glossiness and sticking power. Makes 1/2 cup.

1/2 cup rice wine vinegar
3 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. salt

In a small saucepan, stir vinegar, sugar and salt over low heat until sugar and salt dissolve. Do not let mixture boil. Stir to dissolve. Set aside to cool and store in a screw-top jar. When ready to make sushi, add 1 tablespoon of dressing per every cup of cooked rice. Adjust the sweetness to taste. This dressing may be made ahead of time and kept in the refrigerator for weeks.

AVOCADO-CUCUMBER SOUP

Make this soup the day before Yom Kippur. The flavours will meld and actually taste better the next day. Make sure the vegetables are very fresh and of superb quality.

1 large hothouse cucumber, peeled
1 large avocado, peeled and pitted
1 cup plain low-fat yogurt
2 to 3 tbsp. homemade vegetable stock or water
1/2 tsp. mild curry powder such as Madras
1/2 tsp. cumin
2 tbsp.lemon juice
1/8 tsp. cayenne pepper
salt and freshly ground pepper
1 tbsp. chives, snipped into 1/2-in. pieces

In a blender, puree cucumber, avocado, yogurt, vegetable stock or water, lemon juice and cayenne pepper until smooth. Season with salt and pepper; refrigerate. Pour into individual bowls and garnish each serving with a few chive sprigs, edible flowers, if desired, and a swirl of truffle oil. Makes 4 servings.

BREAK THE FAST COLE SLAW WITH CELERY-GINGER DRESSING

Prepare cabbage and cut up vegetables the day before. Store them tightly in sealed plastic bags. Make dressing the day before, store in jar in the refrigerator; bring to room temperature just before dressing salad. Serves 6 to 8 as a side dish.

1 large red or green cabbage
1/2 head red cabbage, sliced very thin
1 head Napa cabbage, sliced very thin
1 large carrot, peeled and grated
1 daikon radish, peeled and grated
4 scallions, thinly sliced on the diagonal

Cut top off of large cabbage, hollow out the inside. Combine green, red and Napa cabbages, carrot, radish and scallions in a large bowl. Just before serving, dress cole slaw with enough Celery-Ginger Dressing so that it glistens but is not soggy. Place dressed salad in hollowed out cabbage, place on platter and serve. During the meal, keep leftover cole slaw in the front of the refrigerator as you'll be refilling the cabbage bowl at an alarming rate. This simple salad will garner raves.

Celery-Ginger Dressing

1/3 cup coarsely chopped onion
1 celery rib, strings removed and coarsely chopped
1/3 cup olive oil
2 1/2 tbsp. unseasoned rice vinegar
1 tbsp. peeled and finely grated ginger
1 tsp. sesame seed oil
2 tsp. lemon juice
1/4 tsp. lemon zest
1 tsp. sugar

Put all ingredients in blender; purée until smooth. Refrigerate until ready to use. Makes about 1 cup.

Aish opens centres at Western and Queen's

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Aish Campus, the arm of Aish HaTorah that has become a staple at Greater Toronto Area schools, has launched two new branches at the University of Western Ontario and Queen's University.

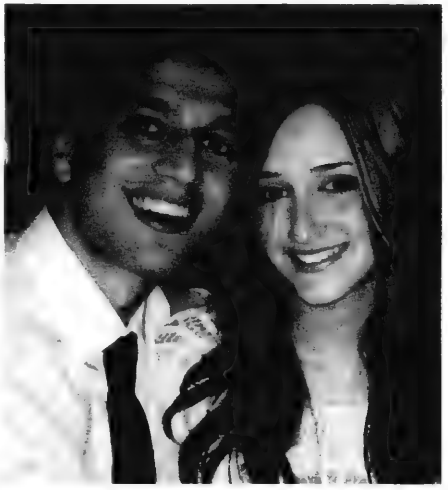
Two young married couples, Rabbi Eric and Ally Lander at UWO and Daniel and Hannah Diamond at Queen's, will serve as the faces of the new centres.

Born in Winnipeg and raised in London, Ont., 24-year-old Rabbi Lander, a married father of one, moved his family late last month near the UWO campus to serve the school's Jewish student population, which he estimated to be about 3,000.

"In general, our goal is to combine Jewish education and Jewish leadership development and to offer programming that bridges the gap between those two elements," he said.

Rabbi Lander, who graduated from York University with a degree in politics and attended rabbinical school at Aish HaTorah in Jerusalem, said his position with Aish developed fairly quickly.

"I just finished my ordination in July. Western was a campus where a lot of Jewish organizations were looking to branch out to over the past couple of years. It was in the works, and we weren't even sure if it was going to happen in September, but the funding was secured and everything else was put into place," he said.



Daniel and Hannah Diamond

Rabbi Eric and Ally Lander

For the Diamonds, both 22, their path towards Aish wasn't as direct.

Daniel Diamond, a second-year law student at Queen's, said that once he was accepted into the law program, he and his wife began looking for a place to live near campus.

They had a hard time finding apartments in the area, but eventually, through a stroke of luck, they found a spacious house to rent.

"We had this whole big house and it was just the two of us. We thought, 'This is a gift from God, so we have to use it right and do something with it.'"

Soon after they moved in, they began hosting Jewish students for Shabbat dinners.

"It was on our own initiative, on our own budget and we felt we were doing the right thing, but we didn't realize how expensive it was."

He said he eventually made a connection with Aish, which was willing to fund their Shabbat dinners.

"One thing led to another… and now we're part of the team."

Rabbi Lander said he hopes that through Aish, he and his wife will be able to offer programing that will combine the concepts of Jewish leadership and Jewish education.

One of the programs offered by Aish is the Jewish Business Network.

"They try to take Jewish business students who represent the future leadership of the Jewish business world, who are going to be decision makers and influential members of the community and give them a background in what Judaism has to say about… values that are relevant to those positions of leadership," Rabbi Lander said.

Having just moved to London last week, Rabbi Lander said he and his wife have barely gotten their feet wet. But he added he's excited about the Maimonides Leaders Fellowship, which began last week.

The fellowship, which has been run successfully at Toronto campuses, including York and the University of Toronto, consists of 10 weekly seminars that explore Jewish thought and its practical applications in leadership roles.

He said the program also includes two Shabbatons, and students are granted a $400 stipend for their time and effort.

Diamond said he is also looking forward to bringing the Maimonides Leaders Fellowship, which he hopes to launch by November, to Queen's 800-strong Jewish community.

The Jerusalem Fellowships Israel trip, which will run in July, is another program Rabbi Lander said he is excited to bring to UWO.

"The idea is… you could enhance the value of [a trip to Israel] by combining the experience with education and exposure to what we like to call a deeper side of Israel," he said.

Since the Diamonds became official Aish representatives, the couple continues to host weekly Shabbat dinners, as well as shiurs and one-on-one learning sessions.

Diamond – who spent his entire academic career in Jewish schools and yeshivas, including Yeshiva University, before going to law school – hosts a class called "Torah-licious" every Monday.

"We explore the underlying assumptions behind everything. We're not just telling them what to do and what Judaism is all about, we're telling them why we should be doing it, why it is relevant to their personal lives," Diamond said.

Like the Diamonds at Queen's, Rabbi Lander said he and his wife aim to provide UWO students with a home away from home.

"Anyone who wants to be part of our family is welcome. This past Shabbat, we had 15 students over to our house for Shabbat dinner. It was a nice intimate meal, and that was an opportunity to bring people into our family."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Palestinian Authority seeks membership in UN

Vote prompts educational campaign

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The Palestinian Authority's plan to seek membership in the United Nations for an independent state has prompted Hasbara Fellowships groups on North American campuses to educate students about the road to peace in the Middle East.

A large part of Hasbara's educational campaign is a new, tongue-in-cheek video called "Friend Request Pending" that emphasizes Israel's efforts for peace, which have been largely rejected by Israel's Arab neighbours.

The video, which has already been viewed close to 60,000 times, begins when Israel creates a Facebook page and is "looking for friends!"

Israel sends a "friend request" to Egypt, to which Egypt replies, "You are no friend!"

Israel then sends a gift of "milk and honey" as a gesture, but Egypt responds with "bombs."

But Israel, unrelenting, writes, "Come on, look what friendship can do for us," and sends another gift, the Sinai Peninsula, in exchange for peace and its recognition of Israel.

Israel goes through a similar process with Jordan, and it, too, accepts Israel's gesture.

But when Israel sends a friend request to the Palestinians, offering them land and other concessions, the gestures are rejected time after time.

The video ends with a simple request from Israel to the Palestinians: "Let's talk!"

According to a Hasbara press release, the video "communicates that Israelis want peace and have proven it. The obstacle to Middle East peace is the lack of a responsible peace partner in the Palestinian leadership. Bypassing direct talks with Israel and defying the United States, the PA is turning its back on previous commitments to co-operation, in an effort to isolate and delegitimize the Jewish State."

Currently, the UN General Assembly vote on the declaration of an independent Palestinian state, as well as the UN Security Council vote on full Palestinian membership, has been postponed indefinitely.

McGill Friends of Israel president and Hasbara fellow Eliana Schwartz is one of the Canadian students who are promoting the Friends Request Pending campaign.

The 20-year-old, second-year McGill University political science and Jewish studies student said that in addition to spreading the video throughout social media outlets, including Facebook, Twitter and YouTube, students have set up tabling sessions to field questions and promote a message of peace.

Schwartz said they presented a poster that said, "You don't get to real peace without talking to your neighbours," – a parody of the tagline for the film The Social Network, which was "You don't get to 500 million friends without making a few enemies."

She said they also presented a map of the Middle East, using Facebook idioms, images and phrases to illustrate the kinds of relationships Israel has with its neighbours.

"We chose to do it this week, with everything that's happening [with the upcoming UN vote] while it's still relevant," said Schwartz, adding that information cards with facts about Israel and the Middle East conflict were distributed to passing students.

"This was a bit of a controversial campaign, so not every reaction was positive. I also think that sometimes Jewish students are scared to approach tables that seem overly politicized, but we tried to make it fun..."

Schwartz said that although the subject matter is heavy, they tried to keep a positive tone.

"At the McGill Friends of Israel, we try to stress that Israel wants peace, rather than stress that our neighbours have refused."

Scientists close in on cure for diabetes

Israel21c

JERUSALEM — Hope is on the horizon for people with Type 1 (juvenile) diabetes, thanks to a breakthrough discovery by researchers at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem who have identified the body's signal prompting production of insulin-producing beta cells in the pancreas.

Prof. Yuval Dor

In Type 1 diabetes, a malfunctioning immune response kills the insulin-producing beta cells. Since the body cannot convert glucose from food into energy without insulin, Type 1 diabetics have to get it through daily injections. Otherwise, glucose accumulates in the blood and causes a variety of serious problems.

The research out of Israel, described in a recent issue of the journal Cell Metabolism, could lead to ways of restoring or increasing beta cell function.

The work on the multi-year project was led by Prof. Yuval Dor of the university's Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada in collaboration with researchers from Hadassah University Medical Center in Jerusalem and the diabetes section of the Roche pharmaceuticals company.

"Our work shows that as the glucose level is increased in the blood, it tells the beta cells to regenerate," says Dor. "It's not blood glucose per se that is the signal, but the glucose-sensing capacity of the beta cell that's the key for regeneration."

This was the first time that this sensing of a high level of glucose has been shown to be the "trigger" that induces beta cells to regenerate.

Dor and co-lead author Prof. Benjamin Glaser of Hadassah used a genetic system to destroy 80 per cent of the insulin-producing cells in adult mice, rendering the mice diabetic.

Compared with control mice, the diabetic mice with elevated blood glucose levels regenerated a greater number of new beta cells, suggesting that glucose may be a key player in beta cell regeneration. But the researchers further found that a glucose-sensing enzyme in the cells, "glucokinase," is the key molecule that triggers the beta cell regeneration.

"This means that the more work that beta cells are required to do – that is, the more "stressed" they are – the more they make of themselves," said graduate student Shay Porat. Porat and fellow graduate student Noa Weinberg spearheaded the study, which was funded with the support of the Juvenile Diabetes Research Foundation.

Because this study showed that regeneration depends on glucokinase levels, the finding may pave the way for developing a new kind of drug to modulate glucokinase or other steps in the glucose-sensing pathway to direct beta cells toward regeneration and replication.

Such a drug could be even more efficient when working in tandem with a mechanism to prevent the immune system from attacking beta cells in the first place. Along these lines, Israeli company Andromeda's DiaPep277, now in final clinical trials, modulates the immune system with the goal of preserving insulin-producing beta cells before the disease has a chance to trigger their destruction.

JGH department goes digital

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — A new high-speed automated registration system has enhanced patient flow, increased efficiency and decreased waiting times in the Jewish General Hospital's (JGH) endocrinology department.

Patients can now self-register with as little as their fingerprint or hospital card number, the JGH said.

"When we renovated in January 2010, we seized the opportunity to improve patients' experience and reduce stress on staff," said Dr. Mark Trifiro, the hospital's chief of endocrinology. "This is especially important in endocrinology, where huge numbers of people walk through our doors – typically repeat patients with chronic disorders."

"This technological upgrade is just the latest way that the JGH has been harnessing digital technology to enable patients to receive health care services more quickly and efficiently," added executive director Dr. Hartley Stern.

"Not only is the registration process smoother, the quality of care is significantly improved, since the electronic system can record medical information and track the patient's progress with unprecedented precision."

The new application, developed by Intégratik, virtually takes over the pre- and post-appointment paperwork – from registration, to the printing of important documents, electronic form filing and checkout.

Once a patient is on the checkout list, a message prompts the receptionist to book a follow-up appointment, if needed. If further blood tests are required, the system completes all requisition forms, eliminating any chance of incorrect tests being performed, and saving the hospital the cost of inadvertent duplicate tests.

"Our life is much easier, which ultimately benefits our patients," explained Claudette Bouchard, an assistant at endocrinology reception. "Since we're no longer running around to find papers and files, we can spend more time calmly helping those who need our services."

As a division that copes with a minimum of 30,000 patients per year, it is an ideal venue to test out such a new technology, Trifiro said. The system can match thousands of patients' hospital card numbers from a secure database, allowing for quick authentication.

"The human contact at the checkout is better than ever, since the staff is not under pressure any more because of lineups," said Chris Polykandriotis, technical support specialist at the JGH Lady Davis Institute, as well as a volunteer in the endocrinology department.

Iran opposes two-state solution

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei attacked the idea of a two-state solution for Israel and the Palestinians, saying the Palestinian bid for statehood at the United Nations is doomed to fail.

Khamenei spoke at the "Fifth International Conference in Support of the Palestinian Intifada" in Tehran on Saturday.

The Palestinians should not limit themselves to seeking a country based on the pre-1967 borders, Khamenei said, because "all land belongs to Palestinians.

"We neither propose dumping the migrant Jews in the sea nor the UN arbitration. Rather our proposal includes a referendum to be participated in by all Palestinians," Iran's semi-official Fars News Agency reported Khameini as saying.

"Today the West is standing on a crossroad, and it should either leave its age-old bullying and recognize the rights of the Palestinians or wait for harder blows in the near future," Khameini added, according to Fars.

Khamenei also called Israel a "cancerous tumour."

The conference, which concluded on Oct. 2, was attended by hundreds of Iranian and foreign political figures, Fars reported.

Last year, Khamenei told a top Palestinian militant leader that western support of Israel was ineffective, because Israel's obliteration was imminent according to the will of God.

"Palestine is the symbol of life, determination, faithfulness, diligence and dignity," Khamenei told Ramadan Abdullah, the secretary general of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad movement.

The conflict between Israel and the Palestinians could be resolved if Jewish immigrants would return to their countries of origin, thus allowing Palestinian refugees to return to theirs, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said on Sunday.

Speaking at the sidelines of the conference, Ahmadinejad was quoted by Agence France Press (AFP) as saying that if "the backers of the Zionist regime want to solve the issue... the solution is simple... everyone should go home.

"Some poor people were brought to Palestine on the promise of security and jobs while they made Palestinian people into refugees... So now Palestinians should go home and those brought here should go to theirs," Ahmadinejad was quoted by AFP.

Ahmadinejad was also quoted by the IRNA news agency earlier Sunday as questioning whether the Palestinian-Israeli conflict did, in fact, have to involve western countries.

"Is it the Palestinian issue and Arab issue, or a problem between the Arab nations on the one side and some western countries on the other side?" the Iranian president asked. "Or it is a problem between Arab nations on the one hand and some Jews who have occupied the Palestinian lands on the other?"

In related news, the French envoy to the United Nations warned Iran last week that it risks a military strike if it continues to develop its nuclear program.

French Ambassador Gerard Araud said in New York: "If we don't succeed today to reach a negotiation with the Iranians, there is a strong risk of military action," AFP reported.

It "would be a very complicated operation. It would have disastrous consequences in the region... All the Arab countries are extremely worried about what is happening," Araud added.

Iranian Foreign Minister Ali-Akbar Salehi had earlier called on the European Union to resume nuclear talks with Tehran. "There have been new developments with regards to Iran's nuclear issue and also other issues," Salehi said in a meeting with EU foreign policy chief Catherine Ashton on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly in New York.

Salehi was referring to his meeting with International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) director general Yukiya Amano in July, allowing IAEA inspections of Iranian nuclear sites and Russian efforts to kick start the talks.

"Iran and the EU have various issues to discuss and could complement one another through these talks," Salehi told Ashton, according to a Foreign Ministry statement carried by Fars.

The UN nuclear watchdog released a report Sept. 3 stating that Iran is pursuing the development of nuclear weapons, and that the Islamic Republic has upgraded its nuclear facilities in order to defend them from possible cyber attacks.

According to the IAEA report, Iran has installed new and improved centrifuges, which according to experts, will be immune to cyber attacks that were able to breach the older centrifuges.

TENT CITY DISMANTLED

Tel Aviv municipal officials, supported by a large number of security forces, dismantled the social protest tents at key locations throughout the city Monday. The task was completed within minutes, without any confrontations between the tent dwellers and security forces. Forlorn residents stood among the disassembled tents of what until recently had been a bustling canvas community. Scores of tents had been taken down already due to a combination of fading momentum and the advent of the High Holidays. The tents had dramatized the social protests throughout the country over the past three months. The Israeli cabinet was scheduled to vote this week upon the recommendation's of the Trajtenberg Committee, which had been appointed by the government to respond to the issues raised by the social justice protesters.

Panetta, Barak discuss concerns over Tehran

JERUSALEM — U.S. Defence Secretary Leon Panetta said Monday that any action to stop Iran's nuclear program must be carried out with the co-ordination and consensus of the international community.

Speaking during a joint press conference with Defense Minister Ehud Barak in Tel Aviv, Panetta expressed concern about Iran's continued efforts to achieve nuclear capabilities and aid terror groups. He said every nation must do everything it can to make it clear to the Iranians that they cannot continue on the path they're currently on.

Panetta also commented on the status of Israeli spy Jonathan Pollard, who was sentenced to life in prison in the United States in 1987, saying that many U.S. officials are starkly opposed to his release.

He also stressed the United States' commitment to Israel's security and called on Israel to engage in talks with the Palestinians toward a two-state solution.

On Sunday, while making his way to Israel, Panetta said Israel is becoming increasingly isolated in the Middle East, adding that U.S. security commitments should enable it to take "risks for peace."

Panetta's Tel Aviv appearance was part of the first leg of a Middle East trip that also includes meetings with Palestinian leaders and a stop in Egypt to meet with top officials, where he was expected to secure the release of U.S. citizen Ilan Grapel, who is being held under suspicions of espionage for Israel.

Peres condemns mosque vandalism

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — President Shimon Peres on Monday condemned an arson attack on a mosque in the Upper Galilee village of Tuba the night before, branding it an immoral and illegal act that contradicts Jewish values and is a source of shame for the State of Israel.

"This is a difficult day for the entire Israeli society, not only the Arab sector," Peres said. The president noted the importance of the time in which the attack took place, the 10 Days of Awe between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

"This is a time for reflection, in which we should condemn such acts among us – acts that sabotage our relationship between us and our neighbours and between the different religions living in Israel," he said.

Peres warned that Israel would not allow extremists and lawbreakers to undermine the need to live together and with mutual respect. "I am convinced that the police and security forces will apprehend the criminals and bring them to justice, but it is up to all of us to uphold the law and stand against those who break it," he said.

The mosque, in the Bedouin village of Tuba-Zangariyee, was set on fire in a suspected "price tag" attack by settlers (an attack on Palestinians and their property in response to Israeli government measures against settlements). The entire interior of the mosque went up in flames, causing heavy damage, and holy books inside the mosque were burned. Graffiti with the words "price tag" was found on the wall of the mosque.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu also expressed outrage over the arson, instructing the head of the Shin Bet security service to quickly locate those responsible. "The prime minister was furious when he saw the pictures and said that the incident contradicts the values of the State of Israel – such as freedom of religion and freedom of worship," a statement from the Prime Minister's Office said. "The pictures are horrifying and have no place in Israel," Netanyahu was quoted as saying.

Some 300 Israeli Arabs clashed with local security forces in the Upper Galilee on Monday to protest the vandalism of the mosque.

Arab League calls for cash

The Arab League called on its member states to offer more financial aid to the Palestinians in response to a report that the United States has frozen $200 million in assistance. Britain's Independent newspaper over the weekend wrote that the U.S. Congress had withheld the aid for food, health care and state building as a result of the Palestinians' statehood bid last month at the United Nations. The U.S. fiscal year ended Sept. 30, meaning that the remaining money pledged to the Palestinian Authority for the year will not be transferred, Ha'aretz reported. The Arab League on Sunday called on Arab states to replace the missing aid with their own donations.

Baird defends Israel in powerful UN speech

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

"Canadian taradition is to stand for what is principled and just, regardless of whether it is popular or convenient or expedient."

So said Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird just before launching into one of the most vigorous defences of Israel the United Nations General Assembly has heard by someone other than a representative of the Jewish state.

In his Sept. 26 speech in New York City, Baird praised the founding principles of the UN, but said that Canada, at least as governed by the Conservatives, will no longer "go along to get along" with the world body on any number of issues, particularly with respect to Israel.

John Baird addresses the UN General Assembly on Sept. 26.

"We supported the aspirations of those peoples who sought for themselves and their countries brighter futures during the Arab Spring that just passed," he said. "But we will not go along with the unilateral actions of the Palestinian Authority."

He called on the Palestinians to return to the negotiating table to reach a peace deal with Israel, saying it's the only way to achieve statehood.

Baird then cemented Canada's position on Israel.

"We uphold Israel's right to exist. We uphold its fundamental right, like any member state, to defend innocent civilians against acts of terrorism. Just as fascism and Communism were the great struggles of previous generations, terrorism is the great struggle of ours.

"And far too often, the Jewish state is on the front line of our struggle and its people the victims of terror," he said.

Baird added: "Canada will not accept or stay silent while the Jewish state is attacked for defending its territory and its citizens. It was accommodation and appeasement that allowed fascism to gather strength [prior to World War II]. As Winston Churchill said: 'An appeaser is one who feeds a crocodile, hoping it will eat him last.'"

He then castigated the UN for consistently failing to live up to its founding vision and principles and urged its members to look at the continuing human rights violations worldwide that remain unaddressed and unsolved by the world body.

He cited the plight of women, Christians, Baha'i and other victims of persecution in Iran, as well as Roman Catholics, priests and "other Christian clergy, and their laity, driven to worship underground in China."

Baird also noted the predicament of Christians being driven out of Iraq by Al Qaeda and Copts who are "being assaulted and killed" in Egypt.

"In Burma, the regime discriminates against several forms of Buddhism and restricts the activities of Muslims. In other places, the Ahmadiyya community faces violence," Baird said. "Gays and lesbians [are] threatened with criminalization of their sexuality in Uganda."

All of this, according to Baird, leads Canada to question "the relevance and effectiveness" of the UN at this time in world history.

"The challenges faced by this organization extend beyond financial probity and operational effectiveness," he said. "This organization is a forum for debate and dialogue, but it must also be a force for positive action to make the world a better place. The UN's relevance and effectiveness are imperiled when the founding principles are observed in word but not in deed.

"So it is when… Iran, which mocks the values of this organization through outrages such as refusing to allow entry to UN observers on human rights, is permitted to seek leadership roles, such as a vice-presidency of the General Assembly and a spot on the Commission on Population and Development. The greatest enemies of the United Nations are those who quietly undermine its principles and, even worse, those who sit idly, watching its slow decline. We cannot sit idly."

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said his organization was "impressed and appreciative" of the speech.

"This was an important framing of what the overall Canadian orientation is [to Israel and the UN]. That is, we are going to pursue a transparently principled position on each issue that came up… and not accept complicity," he said.

Fogel also thanked Baird for putting Canadian support for Israel within a "larger context."

"We were extremely gratified at [Baird's] courage and forthrightness. We think that will resonate strongly with likeminded countries within the international community and remind them of the imperative for them to adopt a similar approach."

Report looks at taxes, travel, banking and food

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Entire swathes of the Israeli economy are riddled with economic concentration, the absence of competition, cronyism and poor productivity, according to the Trajtenberg Committee's final report on a new socioeconomic agenda for Israel.

The result of the overly concentrated economy is that Israeli consumers pay more for goods and services, the committee said. The committee, headed by Manuel Trajtenberg, filed its recommendations last week, covering a vast range of sectors. The committee was established in response to the social tent protest across Israel this past summer.

Food prices – including the cost of staples – have become a flashpoint. In Israel and elsewhere, the answer lies in competition from imports, the committee stated.

Privately owned monopolies that do most of their business within Israel must be forced to publish financial statements like publicly traded companies, the panel suggested. This would force fresh-food giant Tnuva and others to reveal their financials. Tnuva is controlled by international investments fund Apax Partners, which has been adamant that the company, which has the biggest dairy business in Israel, keeps its figures confidential. Tnuva was also a trigger behind the "social protest," which began when the company and its two main rivals raised the price of cottage cheese once too often.

Cooking-gas prices should come back under government control, which was rescinded in 2007, and the big gasoline retailers should be forced to sell some of their stations in the cities to smaller rivals, the panel urged.

Among the many other issues the committee addressed are the country's banks, which the panel skewers for heavy charges and opacity. Another is the tax system. The public transport system is crying out for attention, while students and the needy should get a 50 per cent discount on public transportation, the panel said.

In a chapter on the banking system, the committee concluded that the banks charge households more than they would if there was more competition. In addition, bank costs relative to their output are high compared with peers abroad. Israel's banking sector is highly concentrated, the panel wrote. The five biggest banking groups control 93 per cent of all assets managed at the banks. The two biggest, Hapoalim and Leumi, control 57 per cent.

Although the committee said it is important to boost competition between the banks, it merely recommended setting up another committee to address the issue.

The public's bargaining power vis-a-vis the banks needs shoring up, the panel said. It urged the establishment of a central credit rater (credit bureaus) for households and small businesses. Today, when a client goes into a bank to open an account, the bank has no information about him. If it had, it could offer "good" customers better terms, as is the norm in the United States.

The banks do have internal systems to evaluate the quality of new clients, based on statistical models. But the information the systems produce is vague, because it isn't based on the individual's own data.

On the issue of tax cuts, favoured by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, the committee suggested instead that the government should raise income tax rates and corporate tax. Not only should income tax rise, so should tax on interest, dividends and capital gains, said the report.

If any tax needs lowering, it's the sales tax, the committee said, urging the government to put together another committee to discuss the black market, which is costing the state substantial sums in lost tax revenue.

On the issue of transportation, the Trajtenberg Committee had two main goals: to entice people to take public transportation rather than cars, and to make travel easier for the needy and to the periphery.

Students and eligible individuals, based on National Insurance Institute data, should get a 50 per cent discount on buses and trains, the committee recommended.

The frequency of regional and local buses should increase by 33 per cent, it added, insisting that in any event, buses to remote areas and to colleges should be more frequent. The police should crack down on illegal use of bus lanes by drivers, and bus stations should have electronic information systems. The committee estimated its recommendations would cost 2.5 billion shekels ($686 million) over five years, but it also said that a one per cent increase in the use of public transportation would save the economy 400 million shekels ($110 million) a year.

The Egged and Dan monopolies should be dismantled and the cost of bus travel should be lowered by 25 per cent at least, saving the state 720 million shekels ($198 million) a year on subsidies.

Close to 55 per cent of new cars in Israel are sold by importers, while four companies control 64 per cent of the leased-car market. The worst market failure is that the leasing companies buy such a huge share of all new cars in Israel and it's in their interest to keep the prices of used cars sky-high, said the committee. Solution: reduce the leasing companies' share of the vehicle market.

Housing lots unused due to bureaucratic inertia

Amiram Cohen

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Between 2001 and 2006, several dozen kibbutzim returned a total of 20,000 dunams (5,000 acres) to the state as part of a massive debt arrangement. Almost half of the acreage is suitable for residential development, yet in most cases, the land is still un-zoned and unused. Even parcels that have been zoned for building have not, in most cases, seen so much as a cement mixer for the foundations.

The lands given back to the state were part of the assets put up by the kibbutzim in exchange for the state and lender banks agreeing to forgive more than one billion shekels ($274 million) owed by the kibbutzim. The calculations were based on the anticipated revenue from sales carried out by the Israel Lands Administration (ILA).

The ILA is the government agency charged with managing and leasing public land, and it was responsible for getting the parcels zoned for residential construction and then marketing them to developers. But in practice only a few tracts were divided, rezoned and marketed. The biggest of these, so far, was a site near Rosh Ha'ayin destined for 1,200 apartments in high-rise buildings, plus 300,000 square metres (3.2 million square feet) of commercial space.

Tens of thousands of apartments could be built with relative ease on the 9,000 dunams (2,224 acres), out of the total of 20,000 dunams (4,942 acres) returned to the state, that are suitable for building – if only the land were rezoned and sold.

These include land at Kibbutz Afek, near the Haifa suburb of Kiryat Bialik, on which 4,300 homes could be built. Kibbutz Sa'ar, near Nahariya, has enough land for 2,400 residences. The acreage at Kibbutz Nir Eliyahu, adjacent to Kfar Sava, could support 1,200 housing units. Other tracts of significant size are located at Kibbutz Bahan, near Bat Hefer, and near Tirat Carmel.

Israel Oz, head of the organization hammering out the debt arrangement for the kibbutzim, confirmed the information. He did not provide an explanation for why prime real estate is not being developed.

According to Oz, Housing Minister Ariel Atias, who serves as chairman of the ILA's governing body, the Israel Lands Council, has said that the kibbutzim should be forced to give up farmland in order to free up land for residential building. Yet the ILA has done little to develop the 9,000 or so dunams of the 20,000 dunams that were returned to the state by the kibbutzim, Oz said.

Asked for comment, the ILA blamed technicalities. It said that it and the agency chaired by Oz, the Administration of Kibbutzim Agreement, had their eye on the land in question from the early 1990s. "It was initially proposed that the banks and the Administration of Kibbutz Agreement would co-operate in the zoning process, but the Finance Ministry objected," the ILA stated.

"After the land was returned [to the state], the ILA began moving forward with zoning," the ILA said. It continued its rezoning and marketing efforts, even though National Master Plan 35, the government-approved 2005 document that guides spatial development in Israel in the first two decades of the 21st century, excluded some of the former kibbutz parcels, it added.

An Israeli in Canada reflects on his 'little country'

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff reporter

As David Berlin's Israeli-born father lay dying in a Tel Aviv hospital, he issued a command.

"Look after my little country," he declared.

Although Asher Berlin and his wife, Rachel, left Israel in 1953 and lived much of their remaining lives in Canada, Israel always had a special place in their hearts.

"My parents never left Israel, they just moved to a colder neighbourhood," observed Berlin, who was born in Israel two years before they immigrated to Canada.

"I grew up in a home where only Hebrew was spoken," he said. "Sabra culture and Israeli values were in my mother's milk."

The death of his father was one of the factors that launched Berlin – a journalist and a founding editor of Walrus, the award-winning Canadian general interest magazine – on a voyage of self-discovery.

On this voyage, which has resulted in the publication of a book, The Moral Lives of Israelis: Reinventing the Dream State, he delves into his all-consuming relationship with Israel.

Published last month by Random House Canada, it is a hybrid, meshing Berlin's reflections on the Jewish state with his own brand of reportage.

"Israel is a very large part of who I am," said Berlin, who spent 15 years in the Jewish state from his late teens onward, serving in an Israeli army reconnaissance unit, participating in the 1973 Yom Kippur War on the Egyptian front and studying medicine, philosophy, economics and law at Tel Aviv University.

But as Berlin pointed out, his father's passing was not the sole reason he decided to write The Moral Lives of Israelis.

As he explained, "I was being pulled and pushed from every side. I was partial to the Labor Zionist spirit of my paternal grandfather, who was one of the founders of Kibbutz Degania Aleph. I had some of my father's 'look out for number 1' Sabra attitude, which he shared with the likes of [defence minister] Moshe Dayan and [prime minister] Ariel Sharon, who was born in Kfar Malal, down the road from Tel Mond, where my father was raised."

Having attended an Orthodox Jewish school and having learned to like Orthodox Judaic culture, Berlin understood the antagonism of some rabbis to secular cosmopolitan culture.

In writing this book, Berlin hoped to sort out the "myriad positions, takes and spins" that had seeped into the deepest recesses of his mind.

As well, he sought to understand why the "far more liberal, laid-back spirit" that prevailed in Israel before the Yom Kippur War seemed to have melted away.

Berlin, who describes himself as a "Jewish secular Israeli," is neither on the left nor the right when it comes to politics in Israel.

"I'm one of the very few Israelis I know who inhabit the threaded thin line right up the middle," he explained.

He does not believe that Israel and the Palestinians are at present capable of reaching peace.

"I do not think that either Israel or Palestine are in any shape to negotiate a full divorce, as [writer] Amos Oz calls a final status agreement. I do not think there is a Palestinian leader willing or able to erase the dreams of the refugees. Palestinian leaders all know that no Palestinian refugee will ever return to his little farm in Jaffa."

He added, "I cannot overemphasize how criminal it would be to negotiate an agreement for which both sides are really not prepared."

Sounding perhaps like Israel's foreign minister, Avigdor Lieberman, Berlin argues that Israelis and Palestinians may yet be able to negotiate the terms of a "divorce" in a generation or two, provided that Palestinian leaders in the West Bank can provide stability and prosperity for their people.

In the meantime, he noted, both sides should strive for something considerably less ambitious, a long-lasting truce, or hudna, an idea propagated by, among others, Hamas, which violently seized and now controls the Gaza Strip.

"A negotiated hudna has to be formalized to the point where each side might be required to post a $1-billion bond, which would be forfeited if the truce was violated."

Being a pessimist, or a realist, Berlin does not regard peace in and of itself as a goal. Given present-day conditions, the objective should be absence of violence, "a precondition for civilized life."

Asked if he has confidence in Israel's current leadership, Berlin sounded a note of caution.

"I cannot say I understand [Prime Minister] Benjamin Netanyahu. Sometimes I think of him as interested in nothing more than proving to his dad that he is as heroic as was his brother [who was killed during the 1976 Israeli commando raid in Entebbe to free hostages aboard an Air France plane hijacked by Palestinian and German terrorists].

"When I hear him declaring he had in mind to purchase fire-prevention equipment many years before the great fires on Mount Carmel or when, more recently, he claims to have anticipated and tried to address social issues in Israel, I think Netanyahu is as stuck as any leader would be in a system of proportional representation that makes any real vision impossible. Some version of public relations may work here in Canada, but in Israel we still need some serious leadership."

With the second war in Lebanon and the war in Gaza as his reference points, Berlin is of the view that Israel has spiralled out of control.

"The ability to restrain oneself, not to submit to irrational stuff that tends to create chain reactions in which the mind goes on holiday, is what I mean by spiraling out of control. There is most definitely a new normative order in Israel in which it seems just fine to talk off the top and react rather than pause. The feeling is the same as one gets in the presence of a hysteric, or at the very least, a very, very anxious person."

Although he worries about Israel's future, Berlin rejects the notion that its survival per se is an issue.

"The Israeli armed forces have proven capable of defending against virtually any attack," he said. "Were Israel to be threatened by Iran, Israel would know how to threaten back."

Despite the dark clouds that linger over Israel, he remains buoyantly confident.

"I just got off the phone with my future in-laws calling from Tel Aviv," said Berlin, whose wife, Deborah, and he have three children. "They tell me what the Israeli newspapers tell us all. These are interesting times in Israel and, more generally, in the Middle East. I agree."

A New Year and a Time of Thanksgiving
Recently we took the time to reflect on the past year and anticipate the coming year.
Very soon we will also give thanks for the abundance we enjoy in our lives – not only for the material necessities and all of the niceties, but also for the good times we spend with family, friends and colleagues who enrich us.
We need to be especially thankful if we are also able to appreciate all that we have without worry, because we have established a financial plan that we will leave loved ones debt-free, maintaining their lifestyle; that will protect us if we become disabled through illness or injury; and that allows us to look forward to a long and healthy retirement with enough income to maintain our own lifestyles; and do all of this while paying as little in taxes as is legally possible.
That is also called "Peace of Mind" and that is what we have been providing for over 45 years!

Lighthouse co-founder releases new CD

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Paul (Poli) Hoffert, the co-founder of the '70s Juno Award-winning band Lighthouse, has teamed up with drummer and composer Jim Gelcer to produce an 11-song jazz CD called How High the Bird.

The Gelcer Hoffert Trio — which includes a rotation of in-demand bass players — will be celebrating its debut release every Thursday in October at The Rex .

Hoffert describes the music on How High the Bird as the three "M's" – Mashups: several songs integrated into a single new song; Melody: piano bass and drums playing melody in unison, and "Monk": a homage to the jazz piano great Thelonious Monk.

"The idea of taking more than one song and mashing it together is something in contemporary music that has become very popular," Hoffert says. "So, we decided to apply it to jazz and to see if we could find some jazz tunes that we could mash up together.

"The opening song on the album, All Weep For Blues, we took All Blues, the Miles Davis tune, and Willow Weep For Me, a jazz standard. When you think about them, they don't seem to go together, but if you play them as waltzes, you can make a common rhythmic element that would let you play the two songs together."

Another example is the title track that combines Morgan Lewis' How High the Moon with Charlie (Bird) Parker's Ornithology using bebop melodies over Brubeckian harmonies with funky bass and drum solos.

"Melody goes back to the jazz musicians of the 1960s, and at that time there was a lot of experimentation, what was known as free jazz. I used to play a lot of that with people in Toronto. One of the hallmarks of the free traditional jazz form into new jazz directions was having the drums play more melodically, rather than just keep time. I suggested that drums, bass and piano would all play the melody for the statement of the basic song. It is a little unusual from what people are doing in jazz these days," Hoffert says.

"Thelonious Monk was a huge influence on me, a bit as a piano player, but a lot as a jazz composer. I remember growing up listening to his records, and you could never miss him because, as a piano player, his technique was probably among the 'lowest' of any of the jazz pianists, but his approach... is very angular and unusual because he doesn't use the standard scales most musicians use."

Gelcer, who hails from South Africa, and Hoffert, born in Brooklyn, N.Y., moving to Toronto at the age of 13, originally met around 1970 through a family connection, when Lighthouse needed children's singing voices for a song called The Chant.

Hoffert continued his music career after Lighthouse disbanded, winning a Genie Award for his film score to the movie Outrageous in 1978. He received the Order of Canada in 2004.

Gelcer has played in a variety of styles including jazz, klezmer and kirtan, and has toured with Lee Aaron and the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band.

Hoffert says his first love was always jazz.

"When I was 16 years old, I had my first jazz album released with some of the greats in Toronto – Archie Alleyne playing drums, Bernie Piltch playing sax. Then I played with Moe Koffman's band, then went to Hollywood and worked with people like Freddie Hubbard. Initially, Lighthouse was really a big jazz-oriented band before we turned to pop hits and had a lot of commercial success."

The Gelcer Hoffert Trio plays at The Rex, 194 Queen St. W., Toronto, every Thursday in October at 6:30 p.m. In addition, you can catch Hoffert on Sunday evenings from 7 to 8:30 p.m. at Musideum, 401 Richmond St. W.

A night in Petra, a day in Wadi Rum, Jordan

Nancy Wigston
Special to The CJN

Two hours after leaving Eilat in a rental car, we cross the border into the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan.

Anticipation is running high: Petra, today's destination, is often ranked second among the Wonders of World, right after the Great Wall of China. Fortified with cups of cardamom-spiced coffee, we pass Aqaba, Jordan's southernmost city, heading along Jordan's Rift Valley.

Despite a changing political landscape, Jordan has been pretty quiet – King Abdullah II remains popular, especially in the Bedouin south.

In Eilat, we asked Ezra of Desert Eco Tours about Jordan. "It's always interesting there," he said with a grin.

You bet. Aaron, Moses' brother, is buried on Petra's highest peak, and Moses struck a rock near Petra to get water for his followers. During World War I, British explosives expert T.E. Lawrence helped rebels bomb the German-built railroad to Damascus, and the Seven Pillars of Wisdom named for Lawrence's book are in majestic Wadi Rum. They are tomorrow's stop – recently awarded UNESCO World Heritage status.

Petra, the mysterious "red-rose city," is the country's greatest draw. A few millennia back, as many as 30,000 Nabataeans called Petra home. Pre-Arabic traders and hydraulic engineers, the Nabataeans controlled the spice route from their rock-fortified city. By 106 CE, the Romans had assumed control, trade routes shifted, earthquakes shook the region and the city became "lost," except to the Bedouins who lived here.

In 1812, Swiss explorer Johann Burckhardt, disguised as a pilgrim, entered Petra and sacrificed a goat at Aaron's tomb. The city was a rumour no longer. But Petra still seems to belong to a different age: no motor traffic, just boys on horseback, and horse-drawn carriages whose drivers offer rides in "desert Ferraris." Camels dot the landscape.

About 800 buildings are carved directly into striated red-gold-pink-green sandstone: tombs, caves, friezes, elephant heads shaped by the wind. Every so often, our Bedouin guide, Ali Qatawneh, shouts our names and we gather to hear tales of Djinn (spirit) Blocks, Bab-el-Siq, Petra's dramatic path, and Wadi Musa (Valley of Moses). Ali describes the modern dam that protects against flash floods and says the entrance is holy, because it leads to tombs. He points out wild figs and oleanders.

"Yella!" he says. "Let's go!"

We know it's coming, but still we are unprepared for The Treasury (Al Khazneh), a first-century BCE rose-columned building whose exact use is unknown. With an eagle and a goddess on top, it's pockmarked with treasure-seekers' bullet holes. "Downtown Petra," Ali says. Cameras snap wildly. Tourists climb aboard camels. We linger by its beauty until reminded that we'll see it again on the way back. Pointing us forward, Ali bids his six overnight tourists goodbye.

Following the Street of Facades, we explore smooth cave openings and a 2,000-seat amphitheatre. We consider climbing to the High Place of Sacrifice, but instead, we opt for lunch. We share travel tales. A young Parisian confesses he needed this vacation because he's at a career crossroads. "It was my father's idea." He smiles. "Sometimes he's right."

At a Byzantine church (450 CE) unearthed in the 1990s, curator/guard Hussein shows us around, explaining the animal and demon patterns on carpet-like mosaics. About 150 papyrus scrolls were discovered here, and Hussein says he gave copies to a visiting Hillary Clinton. He asks about the Clintons and seems delighted by news of Chelsea's wedding: "Mabrouk" (congratulations), he says.

We've seen much but not nearly everything, even though only a fraction of Petra has been excavated. Watching a fiery sunset, we relax on a hilltop at Taybet Zaman, a former Bedouin village, now a hotel. In the Turkish bath, we rest on benches under arches, while thick steam softens us up. A masseur then pummels our bones and scrubs away the desert. Afterward, we are served sweet-hot mint tea.

With morning comes our next guide, Ali Hellalat. Six years retired from the Jordanian Army, Hellalat is all energy. He knows California, where he trained for a while, and is a fan of Oprah and the National Geographic channel – and he admires King Abdullah II, whose 49th birthday is today.

All day we ask him questions, all day he patiently answers. At Wadi Rum (720 square kilometres in total), Hellalat explains – with the Seven Pillars or Mount Rum looming behind him – that Bedouin environmental concerns about burgeoning tourism in the '80s resulted in a single, tourist-designated village: Rum. With Hellalat at the wheel, we pass into a world of granite and sandstone, cliffs, dunes, wind-sculpted mountains. Nothing exists except us, our 4x4, mountains, desert and sky. No wonder Lawrence fell in love with this place. Hellalat's grandfathers hunted with Lawrence. But wasn't he a British spy? Our guide says only, "Some liked him, some didn't."

Typically, when we stop to admire a rock bridge or a petroglyph-painted canyon, Hellalat climbs the rock face after first studying his route. This agile creature also cooks. As we rest our backs on sun-warm rocks, he prepares the charcoal grill. Laying a cloth on the sand, he heaps platters with grilled chicken, mint-tomato salads, roasted peppers and baklava, made by his son.

Pouring tea, Hellalat explains that its unique flavour comes from dried betera, a medicinal desert herb. "The best tea is brewed over a fire in the desert, in a brass kettle." Who would disagree?

Our desert excursion yields surprise after surprise – not least meeting women tourists from Hong Kong and Malaysia in a narrow chasm – as Hellalat climb-jumps above us. In this wild and beautiful landscape, the standout has been our gourmet, rock-bounding guide, whose roots are here, and who needs no GPS to find his way.

The sun sets as we head back to the border, too late for shopping in Aqaba. Doesn't bother us at all.

If you go: We flew Air Canada to Israel and drove a rental car south to Eilat. Friends recommended Desert Eco Tours: www.desertecotours.com, for which we are grateful. We upgraded our night in Petra to stay at the memorable Taybet Zaman Bedouin Village. If you're staying in Eilat on the way to or from Jordan, try the affordable beachside Orchid Reef (www.orchidreef.co.il).

Names in the News: Vancouver-born Adam Seelig, artistic director of the Toronto-based One Little Goat Theatre Company, has written Like the First Time, a play based on a 1920 play by the late Italian playwright Luigi Pirandello.

Inspired by Pirandello's provocative drama about a woman torn between her current life as a single woman and her past life as a wife and mother, Seelig wrote the play while living with his family on kibbutz Lehavot Haviva in Israel. Pirandello is best known for breaking down the "fourth wall" between stage and audience.

Seelig wrote Like the First Time without punctuation and arranged like poetry on the page to allow the actors the greatest possible lattitude in how they emphasize the text. Walmer Centre Theatre, 188 Lowther Ave., Oct. 28 to Nov. 13. 416-915-0201, www.OneLittleGoat.org

Persian singer breaks boundaries

Dvora Meyers
JTA

Growing up, Galeet Dardashti toured and performed with her father, Farid, a renowned cantor, performing Middle Eastern and Persian music throughout the United States and Canada as part of The Dardashti Family.

Dardashti, a mother of two in her mid-30s, is now carrying the musical mantle of her family, which stretches back several generations in Iran, on her own. The lead singer of Divahn, an all-female Middle Eastern ensemble, Dardashti just finished Monajat, a solo tour of the United States.

In Monajat, Dardashti has taken the 13th-century Sufi poem of the same name, which means "fervent prayer," and blended it into the traditional Persian songs and liturgy for Slichot, the penitential prayers recited by Jews in the days leading up to the High Holidays.

"My idea with this show," Dardashti explains, "was reinventing a ritual" – a task made more difficult by the fact that Slichot isn't even on the radar of most North American Jews.

The show featured Dardashti performing some of the Persian piyyutim, or liturgical poems, traditionally chanted by men as part of the Selichot service, as well as other liturgical and secular Hebrew and Persian poetry set to new music.

Galeet Dardashti

Dardashti first learned of Monajat while listening to recordings of her grandfather, Yona, a famous singer of Persian classical music as well as a cantor. At the end of his recitation of Selichot, he would freestyle to the poem in a manner consistent with other Persian classical singers.

"You choose poets you like and then you basically improvise to their poems," Dardashti says, explaining her grandfather's method. "It's a cool thing he found this poem so thematically related to Slichot."

But more than serving as the inspiration for her show, Yona, who had a weekly television program in his native Iran, accompanied his granddaughter during the performance — she sang along with her grandfather's recorded voice. Monajat also featured video from artist Dmitry Kmelnitsky, who incorporated images during the performances.

Given Dardashti's lineage, it may seem like her musical path was preordained. Yet it came as a surprise, if not to everyone else then at least to her.

"I didn't think my music would take a major part of my career," says the singer, who in 2009 earned a doctorate in anthropology with a focus on Middle Eastern and Arab musical performance in Israel.

She thought that her academic pursuits would occupy a more central position in her life. But, she recalls, in "Austin, Texas, as a graduate student, I started to do some music on the side. The music just took off in a way that I would not have expected."

Dardashti began to receive recognition for her first album, The Naming. The project brought together stories about female characters from the Torah, midrash and other sources to create a collage of Jewish texts, which gave voice to the marginalized women in the Bible such as Michal, the daughter of Saul and wife to David, who never bore any children, or Vashti, the wife of Achashverosh, who often is vilified in rabbinic literature.

While Monajat has no explicitly feminist message like The Naming, Dardashti does recognize that being a woman reciting Persian liturgical poetry is statement enough, especially in a community that does not have female cantors.

"I'm doing this sacred music from the Persian tradition basically as a chazzan, so I don't think I need to do anything more," she says.

Yet Dardashti has never encountered any resistance in her immediate family. Her father, recently retired, was a Conservative cantor at an Ashkenazi synagogue who encouraged his daughters to pursue their passions.

"I was never told this was a male realm," she says.

For Dardashti, her new show is about helping people rediscover a powerful tradition. She says she hoped that people came away from the performance "with a new appreciation for the ritual of Slichot."

Scholar writes fine book on Canadian Zionism

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Zionist ideology and sentiment have been tightly woven into the fabric of Canada's Jewish community from the earliest days of modern political Zionism, founded by Viennese journalist Theodor Herzl.

This is the thesis that Canadian scholar Henry Srebrnik presents in his fine new book, Creating the Chupah: The Zionist Movement and the Drive for Jewish Community Unity in Canada, 1898-1921 (Academic Studies Press).

Henry Srebrnik

Srebrnik, a professor of politics at the University of Prince Edward Island, argues convincingly that Jews in Canada were drawn to Zionism from the moment the World Zionist Organization was established in Basel, Switzerland, in 1897.

Such was the primacy of Zionism in this country that it was never seriously challenged by socialism or anarchism, he adds, quoting the rabbi and writer Stuart Rosenberg.

Zionism entrenched itself in Canada because, as the historian Gerald Tulchinsky has observed, it strengthened the identity of Canadian Jews, who were largely of eastern European origin, and provided "an important vehicle for political expression and ethnic pride."

From the outset, Zionism in Canada was a nationwide rather than a regional phenomenon, attracting both secular and observant Jews, as well as working class, middle class and upper class Jews.

Srebrnik quotes historian Michael Brown: "Zionists were involved in almost all Jewish activities and institutions – they were the Jewish community, not merely a section of it."

Driving home this pivotal point, Srebrnik says, "Canadian Jewry saw Zionism as a total weltanschauung, concerned with all aspects of Jewish life and concerns, be they political, economic, cultural or national."

Srebrnik's book, much of it originally written when he was a graduate student at Brandeis University, is based mainly on primary sources, many in Yiddish, a language he speaks and reads fluently.

Creating the Chupah is, as he notes in the preface, only the second comprehensive study on the topic.

The first, by David Azrieli, a businessman who divides his time between Montreal and Israel, was titled Rekindling the Torch: The Story of Canadian Zionism, and was published three years ago.

What distinguishes Azrieli's useful work from Srebrnik's Creating the Chupah is that the latter delves far more deeply into the era at hand, which culminated with the formation of the Canadian Jewish Congress in 1919 and the emergence of a revitalized and reorganized Canadian Zionist Organization in 1921.

Zionism in Canada was a many-splintered thing, he writes.

General Zionism, a strand represented by the Federation of Zionist Societies in Canada, tended to be conservative and associated with Jews long settled in Canada. Poale Zion, or labour Zionism, was representative of more recently arrived Jews from eastern Europe.

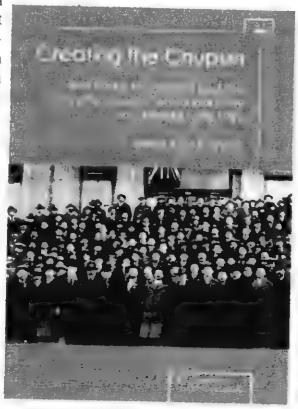
"The two strands of Zionism, often in conflict, reflected the larger 'uptown-downtown' disputes and intense struggle for influence and even hegemony," says Srebrnik, whose last book was Jerusalem on the Amur: Birobidzhan and the Canadian Jewish Communist Movement, 1924-1951, published in 2008.

In an important aside, he explains that while Zionism in the United States was generally regarded as a humanitarian cause designed to help fellow Jews in Palestine, Zionists in Canada also perceived it as a vessel for Jewish national survival.

Due to its eastern European traditions, virtual absence of Reform Judaism and fewer opportunities for assimilation, Canadian Jewry was "fertile ground" for Herzlian Zionism from 1898 onward, he says.

Herzl, in a letter in English to Montreal Jewish community leader Clarence de Sola, expressed satisfaction that Zionism had caught on in the city.

According to Srebrnik, a thorough researcher and lucid writer, the first modern Zionist group in Canada, Agudath Zion, was founded in Montreal. A year later, in 1899, the Canadian Federation of Zionist Societies was founded, with headquarters in Montreal and branches in Toronto, Winnipeg, Ottawa, Kingston and Quebec City.



"The federation was more than simply a Zionist organization," he says. "It was Canada's first national Jewish society."

Despite its success, Zionism did not enjoy universal support. At a convention of Reform rabbis in Montreal, held at Montreal's Temple Emanu-El in 1897, the renowned American rabbi, Isaac Meyer Wise, castigated Herzl's Zionist program as "a thoughtless utopia" and "a momentary inebriation of morbid minds."

To Reform Judaism, Zionism was clearly "an unpleasant episode in our history."

In Srebrnik's view, Canadian Zionism was especially strong in the western provinces, since it combatted the sense of isolation felt by many Jews on the prairies.

In Winnipeg, where class differences were apparently sharp, Zionism unified Jews of diverse backgrounds, a fact that prompted the Manitoba Free Press tocomment: "If the Zionist movement has done nothing else, it has at any rate once more brought together the splintered fragments of the ancient race and has revived in them a feeling of solidarity."

Interestingly enough, pro-British Canadian Zionists cut off aid to the yishuv in Palestine when World War I started, lest they be accused of supporting the Ottoman Turkish enemy.

Taking note of this development, Arthur Meighen, a future Canadian prime minister, expressed sympathy for Zionism and wished it well, a tradition that his successors have embraced.

Srebrnik, in the last two chapters, describes the events that climaxed with the creation of the Canadian Jewish Congress. After years of debate, some of it acrimonious, the vast majority of Jews, including Zionists, finally agreed that CJC's time had come.

In 1921, the Federation of Zionist Societies changed its name to the Zionist Organization of Canada. It, in turn, was supplanted by the Canadian Zionist Federation.

Shortly after the 1967 Six Day War, the CJC joined the CZF and B'nai Brith to form the Canada-Israel Committee, which lobbied on behalf of Israel.

By then, he says, the Zionist movement in Canada had lost its dominance in the Jewish community, though its tenets still commanded the loyalty of most Jews.

Creating the Chupah, a work of great sweep, should be required reading for anyone even remotely interested in the Jewish experience in Canada.

Sephardi soccer league attracts 100 youngsters

David Grossman
Special to The CJN

Sometimes a simple conversation can lead to a success story.

That's how the Sephardic Community of Toronto, known by the acronym SCOT, brought its soccer league to fruition.

"I never thought I would have so much fun – especially playing with other kids and not feeling like I had to win all the time," said eight-year old midfielder Cayla Keslassy.

Her older sister, Emma, saw things slightly differently.

"It's my first trophy, and it means so much to me," said the 10-year-old, clutching the 12-inch championship trophy she gets to keep. (League officials will hold on to the larger championship awards.)

"My father said to go out and do the best I could, but I also learned about what it's like being part of a team and not trying to do everything myself," Emma said.

Those are words organizers were hoping to hear.

Isaac Osiel, Michael Benarroch, Annie Benlezrah and Jacob Abecassis had tossed around ideas on how to get youngsters from Toronto's growing Sephardi community together to socialize, have fun and get in shape.

They turned to sports and picked one that's actually more popular in Canada than hockey.

Almost 100 boys and girls, ages four to 11, were organized into co-ed teams in a matter of just two weeks for the summer league. Organizers then found volunteer coaches and corporate sponsors. Players paid $40 to cover the cost of uniforms and other items, and each received a small trophy for taking part.

Games took place at a York Region municipal park down the street from the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill.

Mission accomplished.

"We looked at ways to have children congregate and learn something. It's not just about scoring goals," said Osiel, one of the convenors. "We figured soccer would be a good challenge, since it's a sport that doesn't require as much equipment as for other sports, which can get very costly."

In sports, there are champions, and, in the case of the Keslassy family, there was quite a bit of extra celebration and discussion around the dinner table, because all three Keslassy children won trophies for being on championship teams. Their father, Jack, was also one of the volunteer coaches.

Cayla and Emma, along with five-year-old brother Jayden, had a vague idea that soccer would be more than just running after a ball, even with some added pressure of having their grandfather, Sal Queroub, taking in the games. He played soccer at the semi-pro level many years ago in Israel.

The girls played on the senior championship team, coached by their father, while their brother was on a junior squad that also finished first.

"The family success is one thing. The bigger picture is all about bringing our community together," said Jack Keslassy, who was born in Morocco and came to Canada as a child.

"We had a phenomenal team made up of young kids, many of them I had never seen before, but they all played and had this look of exuberance and passion. You give them a soccer ball and an opportunity, and they learned a great deal."

Keslassy said volunteering was a "rewarding experience."

"If I am asked, I'll coach again. My reward was watching the enthusiasm of these youngsters. We do this to benefit kids and bring the Sephardi community together more," he said.

Abecassis said that although SCOT's objective was to create the league for the Sephardi community, which numbers more than 20,000 in the Toronto area, it didn't turn away Ashkenazi Jews.

"We don't shut the door on anyone Jewish who wants to play," Abecassis said. "That's not us. [SCOT] started about four years ago, but it became apparent that we needed to expand our ideas and look for more opportunities for people of all ages."

The Israeli-born Abecassis, whose parents are from the Moroccan tourist town of Tangiers, now plans to develop a baseball league that may begin next year, as well as a basketball program for adults.

German Jewry's greats lie in Berlin cemetery

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

BERLIN — The greats, or at least some of them, rest in peace in Weissensee.

This Jewish cemetery in northeastern Berlin, the largest one in Europe, contains the gravestones of some of the most illustrious figures in German Jewry.

German Jews such as Leo Baeck, Hermann Cohen, Berthold Kempinski, Rudolf Mosse, Hermann Tietz and Stefan Heym are buried here.

Also interred here are the remains of about 500 Jewish German soldiers killed in World War I and the corpses of Jews murdered in Nazi concentration camps.

All in all, there are 115,000 graves, in 120 sections, in this vast cemetery.

Covering an area of 42 hectares, Weissensee, from a distance, looks more like a park than a cemetery. But upon closer inspection, a visitor sees rows upon rows of tombstones.

Weissensee is the third non-Orthodox Jewish cemetery in Berlin since the 17th century. The first one, the Grosse Hamburger Strasse cemetery, was inaugurated in 1672 and reached its full capacity in 1827. The Nazis uprooted it in 1942. The Schonhauser Allee cemetery supplanted it in 1827, reaching its limit in the 1880s.

Weissensee, opened in 1880, was designed by German architect Hugo Licht in Italian neo-Renaissance style. Approached from either Herbert Baum Strasse or Indira Gandhi Strasse, it is surrounded by a yellow brick wall.

The tombstone of Rabbi Leo Baeck

Weissensee cemetery is overgrown with foliage and trees. [Sheldon Kirshner photos]

Facing it is a phalanx of drab apartment buildings.

A Holocaust memorial in front of the main entrance lists the name of Nazi concentration camps. Next to it is a memorial dedicated to the Jewish soldiers who fell in World War I.

For reasons that still remain obscure, Weissensee was spared by the Nazis. During World War II, however, Allied bombing raids inadvertently destroyed about 400 graves and a building.

For a decade after the war, Jews from East Berlin and West Berlin were buried in the cemetery. But after the mid-1950s, Weissensee was put to use exclusively for Jews living in East Berlin, the capital of East Germany.

In the 1970s, plans to build an expressway through Weissensee were nipped in the bud by objections from the small Jewish community. During this period, the cemetery was largely unattended, partially obscured by foliage and trees.

With Germany's reunification in 1990, Weissensee was again open to all residents of Berlin.

Two years ago, in a project financed by the federal government and the Berlin municipality, Weissensee was given a facelift. The wall around it was renovated, the paths were cleared and mouldering gravestones were restored.

But even today, some tombstones, their inscriptions wearing off, are covered in ivy and tilt forward, backward and sideways.

The tombstones immortalize the mighty and the unknown.

The tombstone of a man named Leo Less (1883-1942), who died in Theresienstadt, is just a few metres away from the gravestone of Leo Baeck (1873-1956), a rabbi and scholar, a towering figure in Reform Judaism and a chair of the World Union for Progressive Judaism.

The gravestones of Hermann Cohen (1842-1918), Hermann Tietz (1837-1907), Berthold Kempinski (1843-1910) and Rudolf Mosse (1843-1920) respectively commemorate a renowned philosopher, a merchant who pioneered the concept of the department store in Germany, the proprietor of a chain of luxury hotels and a pre-eminent publisher of daily newspapers in Berlin.

The gravestone of Stefan Heym (1913-2001) pays tribute to a well-known journalist, novelist and political dissident.

A walk through Weissensee – the subject of a recent German documentary by Birgitta Wauer titled In Heaven Underground: The Jewish Cemetery in Berlin-Weissensee – is historically intriguing. It is like embarking on a journey back into the mists of time.

Israel's population grows 1.9% since 2010

Moti Basok
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

On the eve of the Jewish new year 5772, Israel's population stands at 7,797,400 people, of whom 5,874,300 are Jewish, 1,600,100 Arabic and 323,000 of other ethnicity (mostly immigrants from the former Soviet Union who are not registered as being Jewish), a survey released by Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics showed on Sunday.

The statistics show a growth rate of 1.9 per cent since 2010, like that of the past eight years. In 2010, the growth rate of the Jewish population was 1.7 per cent, that of the Arabic community was 2.5 per cent and the population of other ethnicities was 1.7 per cent. The growth rate of the Muslim community was 2.7%, that of the Christian community was 0.9% and of the Druze community was 1.8%.

According to the statistical abstract, Israel's population is considered young compared to western countries. In 2010, 28 per cent of Israel's population was aged between 0 and 14, compared to 17 per cent in other western countries, and about 10 per cent were over 65 years old, compared to 15 per cent in western countries.

About 41 per cent of Israel's population resides in the centre of the country, with about 24 per cent in the Central District and about 17 per cent in the Tel Aviv District. In the Northern District reside about 17 per cent of the population, about 14 per cent live in the Southern District, and in each of the Haifa and Jerusalem Districts reside about 12 per cent. An additional four per cent live in the West Bank.

A total of 48,997 couples married in Israel in 2009, of which 37,165 were Jewish couples (76 per cent) and 9,999 were Muslim (20 per cent). On the other hand, 13,233 couples divorced, of which 10,928 were Jewish (83 per cent) and 1,393 Muslim (11 per cent).

In 2010, 166,255 babies were born, 3.2 per cent more than in 2009, and the average number of children per mother was 3.03.

About 200,000 people aged 20 and over, 5.4 per cent of the population in that age range, defined themselves as "newly religious," of which 70 per cent were Israeli-born.

Of Jews aged 20 and over (about 790,000 people), 5.4 per cent reported being more religious now than they were in the past, while 14 per cent of Jews reported being less religious than they were in the past.

Survivors' stories, pictures preserved on website

More news for young Jews on heebonics.ca

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

At 1000memories, everyone's stories and pictures are worth preserving and sharing. What's old can become new again and can be saved forever for all to enjoy.

Founded by Rudy Adler, Jonathan Good and Brett Huneycutt, 1000memories.com is a free website that celebrates the lives of people who matter most – friends and family, past and present.

The company helps bring albums, scrapbooks and photo-filled shoeboxes out of the closet and into an online space, where they can be shared and celebrated, said Michael Katchen, director of business development.

"When a close friend of our founders passed away last year, they became painfully aware of the shortcomings of social networks for remembering people online," Katchen said.

"We all shared stories on his Facebook page, but not long after, his page was 'memorialized' by Facebook and all of the stories were deleted."

It became clear to the founders of 1000memories that there was no permanent place online for family and friends to easily come together and share memories of the people they care about.

Katchen said 1000memories recently teamed up with March of the Living Canada to collect, preserve and share the stories of Holocaust survivors. The memory page, which can be viewed at 1000memories.com/march-of-the-living "is an amazing and important project to record the stories of survivors before it is too late. It is also the first attempt to tap into the vast oral history of March of the Living alumni who had incredible exposure to survivors throughout Poland and Israel."

As a 2004 March of the Living alumni, Katchen said he is "acutely aware of the growing urgency to collect, preserve and share the stories of Holocaust survivors."

After learning of the deaths of two survivors who were involved with the program, he approached Alana Getzler, the director of March of the Living's Toronto chapter and Eli Rubenstein, its national director, in July to help in his mission.

"Our aspiration is to collect as many stories as possible and preserve them for future generations. 1000memories makes it easy for everyone to participate, and we hope this inspires lots more people to contribute the stories, photos and videos of survivors they know," Katchen said.

He added that there are plenty of sites that let people share their "present" with others, but not many sites that allow people to share their past – "the pre-Internet photos and stories that have otherwise been sitting in closets, unshared with the exception of the occasional holiday or family gathering."

Since the launch of 1000memories in 2010, the company has consistently grown and evolved, adding new features and capabilities regularly.

It has become "a rich, dynamic, collaborative collection of the extraordinary stories of everyday people," Katchen said.

"It is our mission to provide a safe place for your memories so that they can be passed down to future generations. This is as close to a permanent space for your memories that you'll ever find on the Internet. And it should be."

To create a page on 1000memories, users can upload photos, text, audio or video relating to any person they want to remember. When a user tags another individual in their photos or stories, the site then attaches the memories to that person's page. If no page previously existed for that other person, one will automatically be created for them.

The site supports content in any language and allows users to order their memories chronologically. Through their partnership with the Internet Archive, the official digital archive of the Library of Congress, the company is making sure that memories will be eternally preserved.

Katchen and March of the Living Canada set up a community page with testimonies from survivor participants and invited a pilot group of alumni to contribute.

"The page is now open to the public and completely free. We are now working to engage lots more people in the alumni community and beyond to participate."

March of the Living will soon need a new mechanism for sharing survivors' stories with participants, Katchen said.

"By collecting their stories now, we are making sure that future generations will be able to discover survivors' incredible stories and learn the lessons of the Holocaust."

Katchen said Holocaust education has always been a personal passion. While attending the University of Western Ontario, he was Hillel's vice-president of Holocaust education for two years.

"This project is a chance to combine my passion for Holocaust education with my role at 1000memories."

There are more than 200,000 March of the Living alumni who have heard the stories of Holocaust survivors firsthand, he said. "The alumni community has an incredible oral history of stories, photos, and videos that has never before been documented.

"We hope this project inspires them to share these memories of the survivors who accompanied them on their trips."

Katchen said each member of the 1000memories team has a unique connection to the site. To see the pages that each staff member has created, visit http://1000memories.com/team.

Israeli winery conserves water

I recently had the opportunity to spend a few hours with Alex Haruni, the owner of the Dalton Winery. While in Toronto, Haruni was promoting the sales of the kosher wines Dalton produces in the Upper Galilee. While we were talking, Haruni was monitoring the progress of his grape harvest back in Israel.

What I found interesting is how the Dalton Winery produces its million bottles of wine in a sustainable manner.

Proximity of the production facility to its main ingredient, the grape, is an important factor in reducing the amount of energy consumed in wine production. Dalton's vineyards are located on a volcanic plateau, 800 to 900 metres above sea level, and combine unique soil conditions, high altitude and a unique climate, all within a few minutes of its production facility.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

The grapes do not have to travel far from the vineyard to the production facility, thereby reducing the amount of energy consumed in transport. As well the grape growers connected with the Dalton Winery have been using more environmentally friendly methods to deal with pest-related challenges, normally handled by pesticides detrimental to the environment.

Water conservation plays an important role in the way the grapes are produced. Irrigation methods used in the Dalton Winery vineyards include drip irrigation as well as the "normalized difference vegetation index method," which enables precision agriculture, directing water to the areas of the vineyard where it is most required. By utilizing these methods, vineyard grape yields tend to be more homogeneous and end up consuming about 60 per cent less water than fruit trees such as apples.

In Israel, just as in Ontario, there is a government-sponsored program that allows a company to sell the solar energy it produces at higher prices than it pays to consume energy. In Israel, a company can sell energy at four times the price of what it pays to consume it. In Ontario, the ratio is 10 to one. The Dalton winery took advantage of the economics to install two photo-voltaic arrays capable of generating about 600 kilowatts per day. "This is enough energy to allow our factory to operate totally on what we generate," Haruni said.

You cannot directly consume what you produce with solar energy in either country, as solar-energy output is fed directly into the electrical grid. The power consumed by the Dalton Winery is a mix from all of the sources Israel uses to generate electricity.

As we move through the High Holiday season and begin to prepare for Sukkot and Shmini Atzeret, it is important to realize how each of us, in our own way can support a more sustainable approach to the growing and transportation of the food that we consume, as exemplified by the Dalton Winery.

"Water and rain are deeply tied to these holidays," says Rabbi Daniel Korobkin, the new rabbi of Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation of Toronto. "We pray that HaShem bring beneficial rain at the appropriate time to nourish crops and fill reservoirs."

Although rain clouds can block the energy-producing sun, the balance is needed to ensure we live in harmony within our environment.

POMEGRANATE APPLE SALAD

DRESSING
(can be made days in advance):

- 1/3 c vinegar
- 3/4 c sugar
- 1 tsp. salt
- 1 tsp. dry mustard
- 1/2 small onion
- 1 c vegetable oil
- 1 1/2 tbsp poppy seeds

In a food processor, combine vinegar, sugar, salt, mustard and onion. After the ingredients are well blended, slowly add in oil. Pour dressing ingredients into a jar. Add poppy seeds and shake well. Store in the refrigerator.

- SALAD (make fresh):
- 1 head lettuce
- 1 pomegranate, seeded
- 1 green apple, chopped

Wash and dry lettuce leaves. Place in an airtight container and refrigerate. Carefully remove seeds from pomegranate. Place in airtight container and refrigerate. Just before serving, put lettuce in serving dish. Add pomegranate seeds. Cut apple into thin strips and add to salad. Sprinkle dressing on top and toss.

Yom Kippur soul-searching is unique for Israelis.

Yom Kippur: staring at your own eyes

On Yom Kippur, we pursue our true voice, our authentic one, the one we hear in our head, the one we sense is attached to our real self and connected to our soul.

Finding that voice, at least initially, can make you feel uncomfortable, ironically, as if you're listening to a recording of yourself. But then it clicks.

Yom Kippur is also like staring at your eyes in the mirror. You can hold that look, initially, for a split second. Your eyes stare back, as if from somewhere else, as if from someone else. But soon you know it's you, and the knowledge you exist compels you to wonder very, very deeply.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

We need to do the same as a community – that is, to seek out and capture our authentic voice to get a firm recognition of who we are and who we are not. We need to look strongly at our own pupils and hold that look so we can be certain of our own energy and influence.

We're not terribly good at that, though, in the Toronto Jewish community. We often accept the status quo, we're mostly unquestioning of our leadership, and we're too content with our own mediocrity and way of life.

Recently, I was listening to Irshad Manji, a Muslim woman who has courageously challenged fundamentalism within her own Muslim community. When asked why she does it so vociferously, at risk of death, she responded, "How could I not? Look what I have in my life. Such freedom and the ability to criticize and make things better."

Manji is right, and she is brave. But who is like that in our community? Shouldn't we do the same? Shouldn't we critique our lifestyle, ideology and policies? Shouldn't we investigate why it is that money and wealth is divine in our town, and find out where God spends his time?

Shouldn't there be someone, some people, who feel free enough to comment about the direction our community is taking when it comes to Jewish education, and not worry about being castigated for challenging the old order?

Let's try something new. I'd like you to e-mail me your thoughts and ideas about real issues affecting you and our community. Let's, together, grapple over the future of our community through debate and discussion. Be ballsy and don't be frightened of your neighbour. Say what's on your mind, and I'll do my best to include it in my columns – no promises, but I'll try.

Let me know if there are questions you believe I should or could be asking of CJN readers. How about questions such as how good is our local Jewish media? What is the nature of our rabbinate – quiet or vocal? Does the local federation inspire or disappoint you? What do you think about what Rabbi Yossi Sapirman has done at Beth Torah Congregation? Should children from affluent families go to Israel for free? Has Ve'ahavta done enough in the area of tikkun olam? Which hero do we consistently forget to honour? Are our kosher restaurants exciting or otherwise?

To start with, please e-mail me at avrum@veahavta.org and tell me how you would best describe the Toronto Jewish community? What drives it? What is our greatest strength? Greatest weakness?

Have an easy fast. Be critical.

P.S. My son and I went to Darchei Noam Congregation on a recent Shabbat and felt so welcomed, more than at any other shul we've visited. Excellent greeting program!

People of the (Nobel) Book

Five of seven 2011 science winners are Jewish

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

Prof. Daniel Shechtman of Haifa's Technion – Israel Institute of Technology became the 10th Israeli in his country's history to be awarded the Nobel Prize last week.

Indeed, Shechtman was one of five Jews, including a former Montrealer, the late Ralph Steinman, to receive the prestigious prize for their scientific endeavours.

Shechtman won the prize for his work in chemistry. Steinman and Bruce Beutler and French biologist Jules Hoffmann won for their groundbreaking work in discoveries on the immune system. Saul Perlmutter and Adam Riess, both American Jews, and Brian Schmidt together won the prize in physics.

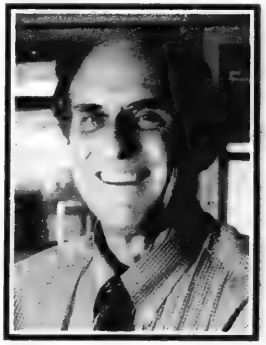
Steinman, a co-winner in medicine, was "a top student, well-rounded, a terrific boy. Everyone loved him," says lawyer Raphael Schachter, who grew up with Steinman in Sherbrooke, Que.

Schachter was two years older than the Montreal-born Steinman, who died of pancreatic cancer at age 68, three days before the Nobel committee announced Oct. 3 that the New York-based scientist had been selected, and two years younger than Steinman's older brother, Seymour, who lives in Montreal.

They all attended Sherbrooke High School and the local synagogue, Congregation Agudath Achim. Schachter's grandfather, the late Rabbi Abraham Mittleman, prepared Ralph for his bar mitzvah.

The Jewish community at the time was a close-knit one of about 75 families, Schachter said. The Steinmans were prominent in the Eastern Townships because Ralph's late father, Irving, owned a large department store called Mozart's.

Schachter's father worked for the store at one point, and his parents were close friends with the Steinmans. Ralph, as a teenager, also helped out at Mozart's.



Ralph Steinman

Please see related story on page 37.

Nettie Steinman, Ralph's 92-year-old mother, still lives in a Côte St. Luc seniors' residence.

A cell biologist and immunologist at Rockefeller University and Hospital, Steinman will posthumously receive the Nobel for his 1973 discovery of the immune system's dendritic cells and how they can be harnessed to fight infectious diseases, disorders of the immune system and possibly cancer.

Dendritic was a term he coined to describe cells that have the unique capacity to activate the latter stage of the immune response when micro-organisms are cleared from the body.

He died Sept. 30 after having been diagnosed with pancreatic cancer four years earlier. He extended his life by self-administering an experimental dendritic cell-based immunotherapy, in combination with conventional treatment, Rockefeller University said in a statement.

Arson Condemned

OTTAWA — Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird condemned last week's arson attack on a mosque in northern Israel. "On behalf of all Canadians, I deplore this act of arson and join Israeli leaders in their condemnation of it," Baird said of the attack in the Bedouin village of Tuba-Zangariyye, that destroyed holy books and prayer rugs. "Thankfully, no one was hurt, but attacks on religious institutions are inexcusable." The attack is thought to be retribution for settlement freezes and demolitions or Palestinian attacks on Jews

Drabinsky To Appeal

TORONTO — Lawyers for Garth Drabinsky were set to seek bail last week for the jailed theatre impresario, saying they intend to seek leave to appeal to the Supreme Court to set aside his two fraud convictions. The Ontario Court of Appeal upheld his convictions Sept. 13 and sentenced him to five years for defrauding investors in Livent, the bankrupt theatre company that he ran with business partner Myron Gottlieb, who is serving a four-year term and had not applied for bail last week. The Supreme Court only hears appeals on errors of law, which Drabinsky's lawyers laid out in his bail application, but it rejects most appeal requests.

U.S. Incidents Rise

NEW YORK — The number of antisemitic incidents in the United States increased last year for the first time since 2004, according to the Anti-Defamation League's annual audit. The audit, released Oct.4, showed there were 1,239 incidents in 2010, up slightly from 1,211 the previous year. The audit tracks assaults, vandalism and harassment reported during the calendar year in 45 states and the District of Columbia. The numbers reached a record high in 2004, with 1,821 incidents reported. Last year, 22 physical assaults, 900 cases of harassment and 317 cases of vandalism were reported.

Shul Fix On Hold

TRIPOLI — A Libyan Jewish exile attempting to restore Tripoli's main synagogue said he was forced to leave the site. David Gerbi, who arrived in Libya from Italy this summer when Libyan leader Moammar Ghadafi was ousted in a rebellion, was warned Oct. 3 to leave the Dar al-Bishi synagogue site by area residents who said men with guns were coming to kill him, Reuters reported. He had discovered the site to be locked. A local military official said Gerbi was being protected and that he left the site of his own free will. Gerbi had started the work of surveying the damage to the shul after spending weeks getting permission from the country's new leaders. Gerbi, a representative of the World Organization of Libyan Jews said he's applying to become a member of Libya's National Transitional Council to represent the Jewish community. He also plans to reclaim Jewish properties confiscated by the state. Most Tripoli synagogues have been destroyed or converted to mosques. Jewish cemeteries also have been destroyed to make room for office buildings. Gerbi fled Libya with his family in 1967 when he was 12 years old.

Montrealer Revived Chaplin's career'

LOS ANGELES — Montreal-born Mo Rothman, a publicist, film executive and entrepreneur credited with almost singlehandedly reviving interest in Charlie Chaplin's film oeuvre in 1971, died Sept. 15 in Los Angeles at age 92.

Mo Rothman

In 1971, some 19 years after Chaplin had vowed never to return to the United States from England over accusations of being a Communist and of moral turpitude, Rothman persuaded a frail Chaplin, whom he had first met in 1953, to return to American soil and make films such as City Lights and The Great Dictator available for public viewing again. The effort culminated in Chaplin accepting an honorary Oscar in 1972.

Thornhill bucks Liberal trend in GTA

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Ontario voters handed Dalton McGuinty and the Liberal party a third consecutive electoral victory, with the core of his support coming from major urban areas, including the GTA.

The Liberals captured 53 seats in the 107-seat legislature, one shy of a third straight majority government. McGuinty becomes the first three-term Liberal premier of the province in more than 100 years.

Although the Liberals dominated the GTA, one riding bucked the trend. Incumbent Thornhill MPP Peter Shurman (Progressive Conservative) held off a stern challenge from Liberal hopeful Bernie Farber, former CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, to keep the riding Tory blue.

Peter Shurman

Shurman, a former radio host, defeated Farber by 20,982 votes to 18,242, although at times early on election night, the margin was only a few hundred votes.

The Conservatives, who led in the polls by 10 percentage points early in the summer, won 37 seats while the New Democrats took 17.

The popular vote was closer than the final seat count. The Liberals drew the support of 38 per cent of voters, compared with 35 per cent for the Tories and 23 per cent for the NDP.

The tally came after a record low voter turnout. Only 47.6 per cent showed up, nearly five per cent fewer than the already historically low turnout in 2007.

Going into the election, the governing Liberals held 71 seats, after receiving the support of 42.2 per cent of voters in 2007. The Conservatives had 26 seats and 32 per cent of the vote, and the New Democrats 10 seats and 17 per cent of the vote that year.

In York Centre, incumbent Liberal Monte Kwinter, who has been an MPP since 1985, retained the riding with 14,696 votes. He defeated Conservative Michael Mostyn, former national director of public affairs for B'nai Brith Canada, who received 11,433 votes. The New Democrats and a host of smaller parties were far behind.

Monte Kwinter

In Eglinton-Lawrence, incumbent Liberal Mike Colle defeated Conservative challenger Rocco Rossi, 20,807 to 12,802. Colle won the riding for the fifth time since 1995. Rossi, who ran for mayor of Toronto in the most recent municipal election, is a former national director of the Liberal Party of Canada.

In St. Paul's, Liberal incumbent Eric Hoskins held the riding he won in a byelection following the resignation of Michael Bryant. Hoskins took 25,052 votes, far ahead of Tory challenger Christine McGirr's 8,971 and New Democrat David Hynes' 7,121.

The UN...further reflections

From the editor's desk...

Last week, in this space, I wrote about the speech Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird delivered recently to the General Assembly of the United Nations. He warned the organization that it is in jeopardy of losing its "relevance and effectiveness" due to the brazen hypocrisy of so many of its member states who "mock its values."

Of course, many serious observers, scholars and diplomats have noted that the UN has already lost its relevance. Indeed Alan Dershowitz last month delivered a scathing denunciation of the UN at a joint Hudson Institute – Touro College conference called The Perils of Global Intolerance: The UN and Durban III.

The noted Harvard law professor and human rights activist referred time and again to the "incredible hypocrisy of the UN" in dealing with any urgent matter of compelling humanitarian concern, but especially so in relation to its treatment of Israel.

Dershowitz was entirely correct in his assessment.

But the organization, alas, cannot be ignored. Its imprimatur carries considerable weight in the underdeveloped world, where UN physicians, agronomists, environmentalists and various aid workers actually do good work helping at least some of the world's needy. Nor does Israel – the nearly exclusive object of the UN's grotesque prejudice, discrimination and vilification – ignore it.

Israel wants to be part of the world. And in truth, the world, despite or perhaps because of its venal recalcitrance and wickedly scheming ways, needs Israel to play a part.

Among the states Baird singled out last month for its mocking, dissembling behaviour was Iran. If he had, instead, delivered his remarks last week, Baird would have wrung his hands even further in disgust, though not in disbelief, at the lower and lower degradations to which UN member states stoop for the sake of their self-serving geo-politics.

Last Tuesday, Russia and China vetoed even a meek, severely diluted resolution at the Security Council presented by the United Kingdom, Portugal, France and Germany that attempted to condemn Syria for its brutal crackdown against its own citizens these past six months. It is reliably estimated that the Assad regime has murdered some 2,700 Syrians seeking democratic reforms. More than 7,000 have fled to camps in Turkey.

The actual vote in the Security Council was nine in favour; two opposed; four abstentions – India, South Africa, Brazil and Lebanon.

In unusually undiplomatic language, the American ambassador to the UN, Susan Rice, said her country was "outraged" that the Security Council "utterly failed to address an urgent moral challenge and a growing threat to regional peace and security."

The Europeans, too, used harsh language to express their disappointment. French Foreign Minister Alain Juppe denounced Assad as a "dictator who is massacring his people." He also promised to support Syrians trying to overthrow Bashar Assad.

Even the usually mild-mannered Secretary General Ban Ki-moon shrugged his shoulders in disappointment, commenting that he hoped the council would be able to find a way to overcome its division because it has a "moral obligation" to the ongoing slaughter in Syria.

As if adding a wild-eyed exclamation point to his glib, self-centred brutishness, the Syrian president last week threatened to rain rockets of devastation upon Tel Aviv, if the West tries to militarily act to protect the Syrian people, as it did in the case of Libya.

In a report carried by the Iranian news agency FARS, Assad said, "If a crazy measure is taken against Damascus, I will need not more than six hours to transfer hundreds of rockets and missiles to the Golan Heights to fire them at Tel Aviv."

Thank God, the Golan Heights is controlled by Israel.

In addition, FARS reported that Assad said he would call on Hezbollah in Lebanon to launch a rocket attack on Israel, adding: "All these events will happen in three hours, but in the second three hours, Iran will attack the U.S. warships in the Persian Gulf and the U.S. and European interests will be targeted simultaneously."

The UN does not, indeed cannot, fulfil its original mandate, the founding principles of peace, justice, civility and dignity for the peoples of the world. There are simply too many member states and their leaders – Iran, Syria prime, but only two examples – for whom the UN's founding principles are dangerous, hostile, destructive, degrading impositions from the outside upon the iron-fisted, unaccountable, rule by the sword that they believe is their cultural if not also divine entitlement.

RAOUL WALLENBERG STAMP SHEET LAUNCHED

A limited edition stamp sheet honouring Raoul Wallenberg was recently launched by Jan Anger, the son of Per Anger, a Swedish diplomat who worked with Wallenberg in saving Jewish lives in Budapest in 1944-45. In launching the stamp sheet, Jan Anger spoke about the humanitarian work his father had undertaken in Budapest and later in other diplomatic postings. The new Raoul Wallenberg stamp sheet has been released in conjunction with Australia Post and Max Stern & Co, a Melbourne stamp dealer. CBC program accused of 'journalistic malpractice'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The CBC is being accused of "journalistic malpractice" for airing a radio program that discussed the demise of the State of Israel without offering a rebuttal.

The program, title "One-State Solution," ran on CBC Radio's popular The Current morning show last week. It featured an Israeli guest and a Palestinian guest who discussed the merits of replacing Israel with a single country that would encompass Jews and Arabs.

Shimon Fogel

The speakers, Israeli author Daniel Gavron and Palestinian activist Ali Abunimah, argued such an outcome is all but assured since a two-state solution – the position of the Israeli government, the Palestinian Authority and the international community – is not going to happen.

They called for a single democratic state, while Abunimah, co-founder of the Electronic Intifada, said such a state would have to offer restitution to Palestinians in much the same way post-apartheid South Africa did.

The premise of the program is "outrageous" and violates the CBC's own guidelines when airing controversial subjects, said Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

"It is hard for me to wrap my head around our national broadcaster giving this kind of prominence to a view that has virtually no support in Israel and is a position that is completely in conflict with the Canadian view," he said.

"There is a universal recognition that a one-state solution either through violence or as a demographic process means the end of Israel as a Jewish state."

"I would say this is journalistic malpractice. It flies in the face of CBC's own policy with respect to balance, especially in regard to issues of a controversial nature."

In introducing the show, host Anna Maria Tremonti, said "a handful of Palestinians and Israelis have come to a radical conclusion," that a two-state solution is not going to work and it's time to try something different.

"They argue a single country, shared by both Israelis and Palestinians is a better, or at least more practical goal."

Fogel said such a perspective is far outside the Israeli political mainstream – Gavron said he couldn't convince his own family to support it – while the show offered a response from a PLO spokesperson saying Palestinians need their own state.

In advance of the program, CIJA called on the CBC to provide a perspective to balance those of the two speakers. Two other views were presented, including Toronto Middle East analyst David Goldberg, but they were brief and were quickly rebutted in detail by the guests.

CIJA is now calling on the CBC to offer another program on the topic, "a counter-story that gives the opportunity to respond to the radical arguments presented by both guests," Fogel said.

A listener unfamiliar with the region could "conclude that Israel's existence is incompatible with human rights – an irony in that Israel is the only liberal democratic state in the area," he said.

Esther Enkin, executive-director of CBC News, said, "the program... was one of many discussions of many complex issues in the Middle East. There were other voices. We knew when we did it that it was a contentious and minority view and said so."

Enkin said the program did not violate CBC's own journalistic guidelines, adding that the network has aired many programs on the Middle East from a variety of perspectives.

"We continue to cover the Middle East in a way that reflects its complexity and will continue to do so," she said.

"The fact of the matter is that the purpose of The Current is to explore a range of complex issues."

She denied suggestions a listener would come away believing that Israel had no legitimacy as a Jewish state.

"There was no ulterior motive," she said. "I think it was an exploration of an idea. It was put in a context. It is a very complex issue."

Fogel said CIJA isn't letting the matter drop. It hopes "to engage the CBC and challenge them" to comply with their own journalistic standards.

As a public broadcaster, the CBC is accountable to Canadian taxpayers. "We will ensure our concerns are heard and there are meaningful responses to them," he said.

Failing that, CIJA is considering raising its concerns again when the CBC's license is up for renewal, and it's contemplating "the political route, to sensitize politicians about our concerns."

"We're not the only one with concerns about the CBC," he added.

Commentators on Sun TV have questioned whether taxpayers should fund the public broadcaster to the tune of $1.1 billion annually, while the National Citizens Coalition, a conservative NGO, has posted an online petition calling for the privatization of the broadcaster.

Kindness of strangers saves Toronto man

David Grossman
Special to The CJN

Eighty-year-old Bernard Greenberg has a terrific sense of humour, and now he can get away with joking that he has two more good female friends in his life, including a TTC bus driver who went beyond the call of duty.

His smiling wife, Sonia, can only nod in agreement.

On the second day of Rosh Hashanah, while walking with Sonia from their Marlee Avenue apartment a few blocks south to Beth Sholom Synagogue for Erev Shabbat services, Bernard had a sudden scare.

It began with trouble keeping his balance, then his foot started bothering him and his head felt like it was exploding. He needed to immediately sit down or collapse.

His wife, who started to shake as a nervous reaction, didn't know what was happening, but because she was heading to shul, had left her purse and cellphone at home.

Bernard, pale and in need of medical attention, was able to make it to a seat in a bus shelter on Marlee with the assistance of his wife.

"My wife is a great cook, so I knew it wasn't her food," he joked. "I was just having trouble, and it appeared like I was drunk. My feet were like Jell-O. It wasn't normal, and there was no pain in my heart, nor did I feel like I was having a stroke. It was very strange."

That's when the two female strangers – one a TTC driver and the other whom he refers to simply as "a mystery woman I hope to meet again" –emerged to help.

The woman, who was waiting for a bus, told the Greenbergs she would pay for a taxi to the hospital, but they declined, wanting instead to just return home.

Meanwhile, TTC bus driver Claire Bilsborough, who on her normal 109B northbound route along Marlee, stopped her bus at the curb, secured her vehicle and, as passengers watched, ran out to help Bernard.

"He looked like a ghost, his legs were shaking, something was wrong, and I was not about to close my eyes – that's not me," Bilsborough, a mother of two and a TTC driver for 15 years, told The CJN.

"I grabbed his arm and helped him to the bus. They didn't want me to call an ambulance. I said, 'You can argue with your wife, but you're not going to argue with me. I'm taking you to the doctor.' I just wasn't about to leave them alone, so I helped him on the bus and took them a few blocks to a walk-in clinic."

Bilsborough admitted she risked her job leaving her bus unattended. She had informed about 20 passengers of what was happening and then helped Greenberg to the clinic, leaving him and his wife only after he was in the care of a nurse.

TTC staff aren't required to physically assist passengers in medical emergencies, but because she went out of her way to help, Bilsborough said she was contacted by a TTC superintendent and recognized for her humanitarian work.

As if that wasn't enough, the woman who had offered to pay for the taxi followed them to the clinic and left the Greenbergs with $77, saying they should use it as they saw fit.

"It was like an angel showed up. I think she emptied her own purse thinking we needed help and not knowing that I had left my purse at home because we were going to the synagogue," Sonia said.

"I looked up and asked her name and address. I never saw her before in my life. She cared so much about us. Can you imagine that? Next thing I knew, she was gone. I only wish I can meet her again so I can give her back her money. Otherwise, I'll donate it to charity in her name."

Bernard and Sonia Greenberg with TTC driver Claire Bilsborough, centre

The couple took an ambulance ride to Sunnybrook Hospital for a stay that lasted about six hours with multiple medical tests. All is fine now with Bernard, who was told a medication he's been taking for 25 years needed adjustment.

The only hitch is that a vacation in Deerfield Beach, Fla., that would have started in November is now delayed a few months, "until the insurance company gives me the go-ahead," he said.

The Greenbergs, who will celebrate a 60th anniversary next year with new stories to share with their three daughters and seven grandchildren, couldn't say enough about the kindness and generosity shown to them by Bilsborough and the woman they call "the mystery lady."

"Can you imagine, a woman without a purse? My wife won't go anywhere now without her purse," Bernard joked.

Et tu CBC?

We understand and accept and agree with the proposition that intellectual exploration, even ferment, is indispensable to the advancement of civilization. We understand and accept and agree, too, with the proposition that democracy thrives with the civil exchange of different, competing ideas. And we further understand and accept that the media bears a key responsibility in a democracy to facilitate that exchange and to elucidate the increments in our knowledge that may arise as a result.

But not all exchanges advance an idea. Some are retrograde.

Such was the case with the unfortunate decision earlier this month by the CBC to dedicate an edition of its public affairs radio program, The Current, to an explication of the one-state solution as a possible option for resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. (See the related story in this edition of The CJN.)

The core of the show was the give-and-take by the host with two proponents of the one-state solution. Daniel Gavron, a Jewish Israeli was a somewhat reluctant proponent. Ali Abunimah, on the other hand, a Chicago-based Palestinian activist, was quite the zealot.

The pleasantness and delight of the host in engaging her guests were part of the show's enormous substantive failure. She allowed Abunimah in particular to extemporize unchallenged, making statements that were egregiously false and always loaded with the code words that were colourfully descriptive to the general listener, but quite unambiguously prescriptive for his confederates and fellow travellers on their dreamed-of path toward one state.

But the host's journalistic failure was a minor irritation. The major pique was that the show brought squarely into question the judgment and even the agenda of the CBC.

In explaining the decision to air it, Esther Enkin, executive director of CBC News, said that "we knew that it was a contentious and minority view and said so. We continue to cover the Middle East in a way that reflects its complexity."

Thus, to Enkin and her CBC colleagues, traversing the maze-like complexities of the Israeli-Palestinian dispute includes exploring the elimination of the Jewish state as a possible way out. For there is no doubt – indeed, that's why Abunimah so effusively embraced it – a one-state solution means precisely that.

Why is it that of all the nation states in the United Nations, only one, Israel, must still ward off attempts – military, legal and intellectual – to destroy it?

We expect these efforts from the people who harbour hatred toward Israel, and even from the naïve, innocent and exploited such as Gavron, but why would the CBC tacitly give those efforts such polite intellectual cover?

Must simplifying the Mideast complexities mean doing away with Israel?

We are, therefore, entitled to ask: et tu CBC?

25 years ago in The CJN

Speaking ahead of a major superpower summit, U.S. secretary of state George Schultz told 400 Jewish leaders who were meeting to discuss Soviet Jewry that the United States would tell the Soviet Union that U.S.-U.S.S.R. relations would only improve if the USSR improved its human rights record, including increased emigration of Soviet Jews.

Jewish tourism in Spain

According to the article "Spain tries to capitalize on its Jewish history" (Rosh Hashanah supplement, Sept. 28), critics of the Red de Juderias tourism network (a network of nearly two dozen Spanish cities and towns whose official purpose is to preserve the cultural legacy of Jewish Spain) and similar projects are "generally vague about exactly what they would do differently." How general is "general"? Many of those with whom I've discussed this over the years say they would begin by including Jews in planning and administration. And Spain is not just "trying to" capitalize on its Jewish history. Spain is capitalizing on its Jewish history. The Casa Sefarad-Israel has indeed made constructive efforts, but the level of cynicism in the Red de Juderias can be sobering. One member town had anti-Israel graffiti up for months on its official welcome sign. Nothing was done, and my conversation with the secretary general of the Red de Juderias about this left much to be desired. Another town's "medieval Jewish" festival featured upside-down Hebrew alphabet characters as "the Jewish credo" and little beribboned rolls of paper as "the Jewish law." Nothing was done or said. This event also featured a "parade of Jews."

Some Spanish musicians have told me they perform Sephardi songs mostly to capitalize on the current fad, securing gigs in "three cultures" festivals (festivities centred around Judaism, Islam and Christianity), then participate in anti-Israel events. One folk group was expelled from a folk ensembles association for accepting an invitation to Israel.

Once I asked if someone outside Spain depicted Catholic practices inaccurately, would that be acceptable. "Of course not!" came the indignant answer, "but this is only about Jews – it doesn't matter."

Non-Jewish Machalniks

The writer of "WWII ace died trying to fight for Israel" (Sept. 8) would have honoured George Frederick (Buzz) Beurling more had he spelled his surname correctly. It is "Beurling," not "Buerling."

Of the 11 Canadian volunteers (Machalniks) who gave their lives in defence of the nascent State of Israel during its War of Independence, three were not Jewish. They are Leonard Fitchett, downed in his Beaufighter by anti-aircraft fire on Oct. 20, 1948, while attacking the Egyptian-held Iraq el Suidean police fortress; Fred Stevenson, killed on a night supply run to Sdom on Oct. 24, 1948, when his C-47 exploded in the air after an engine caught fire; and Beurling, killed near Rome on May 20, 1948, in a crash of an airplane being readied for its ferry flight to Israel. They are all buried in the non-Jewish section of Haifa's military cemetery.

Sadly, today the contribution of the approximate 3,500 foreign volunteers, unsung heroes who defended the fledgling State of Israel and who, in the words of former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, "came to us when we most needed them," has been all but forgotten.

The Technion's scientific summer camp

I would like to commend Frances Kraft on her interview with Yaakov Green regarding the scientific summer program, Scitech, at the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology ("Student enthralled by Israeli science camp," cjnews.com). Green attended the Scitech 2011 summer camp in Haifa this past summer. Participants work beside Technion faculty who act as mentors, and socialize with participants from many countries. I am looking for details on Alfred Norman Rosen. I was born Carole Anne Rosen in London, England, in 1944. My mother married Alfred Norman Rosen in 1943 when he was 21. On the marriage certificate, he is listed as serving with the Princess Louise Dragoon Guards K75475. He was listed as a gold miner, and his father, Carl Rosen, as a mining engineer. I have been searching for Rosen family contacts for some time with no luck. The Commonwealth War Graves site does not show him as dying in the war. Please contact me if you have any information.

The heart must rule the mind

By
Seymour Epstein

I was privileged to witness the liberation, at communism's fall, of the millions of Jews across the breadth of the Former Soviet Union who had been distanced from their Judaism and from world Jewry by the anti-Jewish policies of their former government.

While they were not in physical danger, another decade of Communist cultural and spiritual oppression might have completely severed most of them from the family of Jews. By the early '90s, they were asking the obvious question: "The Soviets called us Ivri in our internal passports. Is that a religion, an ethnic-national identity or simply a licence to now learn Hebrew and leave for Israel?"

I might have wished that they could read Ze'ev Maghen's brilliant book, IMAGINE: John Lennon & the Jews: A Philosophical Rampage (2010). But if the book was translated into Russian for the benefit of these questioning Jews, who, well into the 21st century, are still unsure of who they are and who we, their new body, are, I'm not sure that they would get the reference to the Beatles and Lennon's song, Imagine. They knew another Lenin much better.

Nor do I think they would get the wild humour of this hilariously funny book on the most serious of topics, since the jokes are mostly American and Israeli from a period our Russian siblings missed out on.

There is hardly a topic critically relevant to 21st-century Jewish life that Maghen does not deal with, but I will let him tell us what the book is mainly about: "The worldwide Jewish agenda today ought to envision and enshrine one imperative beyond every other: an all-out campaign on every front imaginable to unseat Universalism in favour of Preferential Love, and to subject Rationalism to the sovereignty of Romance. (Maghen's emphasis)

You cannot be expected to understand what he means, nor why he deems these two issues critical to a meaningful Jewish existence in our times, unless you read the book – the very reason I am writing this essay. I think this volume of 331 pages, including an epilogue unlike any you have seen, has the potential to become a cult book for certain kinds of questioning Jews in the "you-name-it-we'll-post-it" generation. It's a book that's easy to get into, difficult at times to plough through (especially if you did not major in philosophy at university), but very hard to put down (double entendre intended).

Maghen is a polyglot, a teacher of Arabic literature at Bar-Ilan University, an erudite scholar of both western and eastern culture, a former Israel Defence Forces soldier in the Tank Corps, the 1983 International Frisbee Golf champion (Junior Division), and funny to the core. His passion for esoterica leads him (and us) to old ideas rediscovered and introduced in refreshing fashion, always with lots of humour.

His powerful arguments that the heart must rule the mind rather than the opposite reminded me of that section in Song of Songs where the female lover's emotions overrule her mind-play. In Chapter 5, we find: "I was asleep, but my heart (mind) was wakeful." (The heart was the locus of cognition in biblical anatomy.) She decides in her mind not to answer her lover's knock, and then, "My lover took his hand off the latch and my innards were aroused for him." (The guts or innards were the base of feelings in the Hebrew Bible.) Now, this might make you rush to read Song of Songs before you read Maghen, but the erotic imagery was interpreted by our sages as representing the relationship between the Jews and their God. Feelings trump the mind.

Or as Maghen put it: "Maybe 'making sense' is really not the most important thing, after all. Perhaps the time has come to humble our cool and calculating heads – and reinstate our bold and passionate hearts as top dog!"

One of the author's most caustic attacks is on apologists of all flavours and forms. He devotes an entire section of the book to debunking the folks who look as though they are arguing out a true conflict in thought, but are really only defending the "truth" as they see it.

He writes: "Somehow, despite all that ostensibly open and honest 'questioning,' such folks almost always manage to end up just where they started from, confirmed in the same beliefs and behaving according to the same strictures they began with, as if all missions of inquiry were necessarily circular. A real 'quest for truth,' a genuine odyssey of searching and seeking, is integrally bound up with not knowing where you will end up."

Of course, those who disagree with Maghen and/or are offended by his iconoclastic argumentation will accuse him of the very same approach. Not I, who think that the very form of his extended essay illustrates a sincere grappling with ideas – a step forward, another step backward and a lunge sideways.

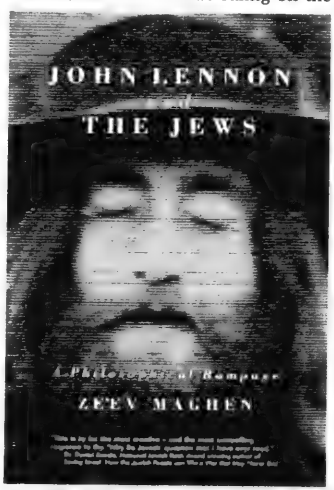
In all the current ramblings about Jewish Peoplehood, Maghen has made a major contribution to a definition of the Jewish entity, past, present and future. He dismisses the notion of religion, a term unknown to the ancients, and shows preferential affection for the idea of family. He calls us "one of the Goldblatt kids" (could also be "les enfants Ohayon") and goes on: "But nothing you or they could ever do can change the simple, ontological fact that you are (like it or not) one of the Goldblatt kids. The only way to cease being one of the Goldblatt kids is… to cease being. In the same fashion, and for the same reasons, you simply cannot stop being Jewish – ever."

I would add that being Jewish even goes beyond the grave. Gustav Mahler is still known as a Jew, despite his conversion. The Archbishop of Paris had Kaddish recited at his Catholic funeral. Maghen compares this eternal belonging in Judaism to religions such as Christianity and Islam, where leaving is possible if not, at times, deadly. We know from the Talmud that "a Jew, even if he sinned, remains a Jew." (Sanhedrin 44a)

Maghen has made a major contribution to a definition of the Jewish entity

It is in Maghen's critique of John Lennon's song, Imagine, that he develops his theory of preferential love versus universal love. The song speaks of the world living "as one" in its paean to universal love, but Maghen argues that this is the very issue that destroys the notion of a Judeo-Christian ethic.

He masterfully compares the Christian Bible approach to loving everyone (especially your enemies – see Matthew 5:43-45) to Rabbi Akiva's ruling on the famous flask of water story in Baba Metzia 62a. Both Jesus and Rabbi Akiva state that Leviticus 19:18, "Love your neighbour as yourself," is the top commandment, but, according to Rabbi Akiva, when faced in the desert with one flask of water that will not sustain two people, the owner of the water keeps the flask, drinks and lives, while the other dies. It is clear that Rabbi Akiva stresses the last part of the biblical commandment, "as yourself," while Christian sources would stress the love of the other. These are two radically different interpretations of the same text, which demonstrate a great divide in moral thinking – not politically correct and very much in the style of Maghen's writing. I would not invite Ze'ev Maghen to lecture at National Brotherhood Week!



Maghen's thoughts on God are as radical as the rest of his thinking. He rejects what the Greeks and the later medieval lovers of Greek philosophy such as Thomas Aquinas and Maimonides did to transform the imperfect and immanent God of the Bible into a rational super-hero, the unmoved mover of Aristotle.

One of the major themes of the book is, as quoted above, "to unseat Universalism in favor of Preferential Love." Maghen argues for a multi-flavoured world where each component first loves itself, and in so doing, can recognize the love in others. With force he makes the point that it is only natural to have preferential love for your own family and that all protestations of universal love as in "Krishna Consciousness" are artificial.

There is more, much more, but I will not reveal the ending, nor do I want this trailer to satisfy any potential reader who will now rush to buy this book. I have a shelf in my library for my favourites, and this volume will end up there when I finish writing this review. Why am I so enamoured of Maghen's treatise? He has accomplished three things: 1. He shows great respect and love for the past in Jewish life by quoting and interpreting our rich heritage of literature and values; 2. He lives in the wider world, open to and curious about the wonders of the variety of human species in the overwhelming majority cultures around us; and 3. As much as he gives the past its vote, he is creative in the very best traditions of ancient interpretation and willing to bet on change and growth. He also is deeply in love with the Jewish People.

Read it for yourself.

This year, let's be ambitious about Jewish education

For years now, I've been lamenting that we are not Jewishly ambitious enough – the very awkwardness of the phrase conveys the unfamiliarity of the concept. We're a driven people living in a high-achieving culture, yet our ambitions tend to be grade-oriented as children and either money-oriented, career-oriented, or status-oriented as adults. And even during the "High Holidays," we spend a lot more time worrying about what to wear or what to eat than thinking about what we hope to accomplish as Jews or what we expect of ourselves as Jews and as human beings.

Gil Troy

in Montreal

Many of our institutions suffer from a similar malady. Most Jewish institutions I know – and especially most synagogues and schools – fail to set out goals for themselves beyond continuing to function effectively. And to the extent that they look forward, they think in terms of institutional growth rather than in terms of breaking new ethical, spiritual or ideological ground, collectively or individually.

Jews without ambition are like cars without motors – we can coast, we can crash, but we simply cannot accelerate, or get very far. Treating Judaism as a series of rituals to repeat by rote, rather than a spiritual, intellectual, ideological and ethical life adventure, shortchanges Judaism – and us. The key to a more vital Judaism, a more ambitious Judaism, is education. The great crime of our generation is not intermarriage, but another "I" word – ignorance. Most Jews coast along on the equivalent of a first-grade education, if that, never appreciating the depth of Jewish civilization.

Ours is the most educated Jewish generation in history, in secular matters, especially in our expert professional lives, but perhaps the most ignorant generation in Jewish matters. Most of us know the Bible stories as a series of childish fables. We view holidays as opportunities for some fun if bizarre shtick. And we think Jewish philosophy is sighing heavily and muttering some incomprehensible yet funny world-weary Yiddish phrase.

Fortunately, exciting educational programs await us, tailored to modern Jews, offering a jump start. Jerusalem Online University offers interesting courses in positive psychology, Judaism and Israel through innovative films for which college students can get credit. Synagogues and federations have started offering quality courses as well, recognizing that effective Jewish citizenship, leadership, and involvement is dependent on Jewish literacy. Meanwhile, the Limmud phenomenon has attracted thousands for intensive learning weeks and weekends worldwide and the Shalom Hartman Institute, with which I am affiliated, has been at the cutting edge of Jewish adult education for years.

Although Chabadniks are most famous for being warm and fuzzy – welcoming travellers, college students, and seekers at Shabbat tables around the world – Chabad Lubavitch's Rohr Jewish Learning Institute (JLI) claims to be "the largest provider of adult Jewish learning." The JLI boasts more than 325 chapters worldwide that have enrolled 225,000 students in courses over the last 12 years. An impressive 62 per cent returned for at least one other course.

JLI sees itself as a "multiplex" of learning, offering a range of six-week courses with great source books. Some of its topics include Ethics and Jewish Law, Psychology and Personal Growth, Jewish history, the Holocaust and Israel. The learning is text oriented and relevant, keyed to engaging adults in deep discussions about contemporary issues, guided by our sages' wisdom. And while in much of the Jewish world, learning tends to be very idiosyncratic, unsystematic, and teacher-dependent, the JLI curricula systematize and standardize the learning worldwide. Although the magic of the classroom still depends on the particular teacher, the JLI's rich materials, thoughtful approach and intensive training guarantee a certain baseline.

Jewish education should not end with a bar or bat mitzvah. As the people of the book increasingly become the people of Facebook, it's more important than ever to engage in our tradition, to join the Jewish conversation substantively with "I think" – not just "I feel" – statements. This Jewish New Year, let's make some resolutions, secular style – but let's make them and not break them. Let's focus on the spiritual, not just the material; on Jewish educational benchmarks, not just career goals, and on stretching our souls, not just indulging ourselves. And let's not do it out of guilt. Let's do it out of commitment to ourselves, our values, our community and our tradition.

Are you a 'zoomer' Jew?

People born between 1946 and 1966 used to be called "boomers" or "baby boomers." We're the largest, most affluent, age-conscious "global market." We live longer, retire later, and buy more anti-aging products than any other group. (That should be self-evident.) We're now known as "zoomers," a term coined just a few years ago with the authority of founding a new religion.

I'm sorry, but I didn't like being called a boomer then and I don't like being called a zoomer now. I don't like being a worldwide market. And I don't like being a label. So listening to the endless zoomerology on my used-to-be favourite classical music station, I couldn't help but feel that the zoomer stuff was bringing up something more for me. I started to think about the whole question of a person's identity. What categories make up the people we are?

Growing up, my generation's identity markers used to be very clear and well-bounded. Boys were boys and girls were girls. We went to law school to become a lawyer and we stayed a lawyer. We were defined by our gender, our nationality, our race, our career and our religion, and all of those markers were static. We knew our labels and we wore them more or less comfortably. But those identities came with a price tag. They defined not only who we were but what we could and couldn't do, what was open and what was closed to us.

In the last 20 years, all those once-fixed categories of identity – race, religion, gender, career, nationality – have been called into question. Everything we once understood as an established piece of our identities is up for grabs. The categories of identity have become porous. What does this mean for us as Jews?

Christopher MacDonald-Dennis, assistant dean and director of intercultural affairs at Bryn Mawr College writes, "Jewish identity confounds established and understood notions of ethnic, racial, national, and religious identity... Jews can be neatly categorized neither as a religious group nor as an ethnic/national group... Jewish identity... is multidimensional and defies simple social categories."

Are we a nation? A race? An ethnicity? A religion?

If you live in Israel, you can say yes, we're a nation. But if you live in Toronto, that's a hard one to lay claim to. And with so much intermarriage, adoption of kids from other countries, conversions, Jews from other countries joining the "mainstream" community, it's impossible to claim anymore that Jews are white or a race.

What about culture? Culture is made up of language, dress, food and history. But are these universally shared by Jews? Would you say the Jews of Guatemala or Uganda are "culturally" Jewish?

So I'm tempted to say that the only thing truly uniting us in a Jewish identity is religion. But how can that be the bottom line when every adjective of "Jewish" is loaded: secular, observant, cultural, denominational, Zionist, Reform, Conservative, Reconstructionist, Orthodox, modern Orthodox, neo-Chassidic, haredi, New Age Jewish Renewal, etc.?

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

How I wish it could be as easy as zoomers! Just give us a name and make us a marketing gimmick already. Being Jewish is so complicated.

But that's what makes it alive, what makes it so fascinating. Struggle is what a hermit crab does when it frees itself from the old and useless shell. I think the power of modern Judaism is its refusal to be defined. Because none of the categories easily work, it's been nearly impossible throughout all of Judaism's long history for any one group within – although some have certainly tried – to hijack or sabotage the meaning of being a Jew.

It's up to each of us to struggle with our own personal Jewish identity. We need to see ourselves as Jews in search of a Jewish identity that is more than a stereotype, more than a caricature, less fixed than a generation ago, but not so fluid that it floats away. An identity not dependent on colour of skin or place of residence, dress, language or mannerisms, or even an agreed-upon interpretation of a sacred text.

My kids are fond of saying we're "underconstructionist" Jews, that we're constantly exploring, growing and changing. Struggling. That's what Jacob did with the angel, and by doing so, he earned the new name of Israel for all of us.

A German school with a Jewish profile

The Judische Oberschule has come full circle.

Berlin's only functioning Jewish high school is back in business again after going through several metamorphoses, one of which was absolutely wrenching.

Co-founded in 1778 by Moses Mendelssohn, a paragon of the Enlightenment and the grandfather of the composer Felix Mendelssohn, it was the first boy's school in Germany to combine a secular education with Jewish religious instruction.

Sheldon Kirshner in Berlin

The school moved to its present location at 27 Grosse Hamburger Strasse, in eastern Berlin, in 1860, a good decade before Germany's unification. It would soon be within walking distance of the golden-domed, Moorish-style New Synagogue on Oranienburger Strasse, which was inaugurated in 1866. It was also next to the 17th-century Jewish cemetery, which was uprooted by the Nazis.

In its darkest reincarnation, the school was closed by the Nazi regime in 1942 and used as a deportation centre. From here, German Jews were sent to concentration camps throughout Europe.

During the Cold War period, when Germany was divided and East Berlin was East Germany's capital, the school was a vocational college.

With Germany's reunification in 1990, the school was returned to the reconstituted Jewish community and completely renovated. It reopened in 1993, resurrected as a state-supported and private coed school with 27 pupils from grades 7 to 12. And in keeping with its original charter, non-Jewish students were admitted.

Its principal, Barbara Witting, describes it as "a German school with a Jewish profile."

It is by no means the only Jewish school in Berlin, which has an official Jewish population of 10,500. The U.S.-based Ronald S. Lauder Foundation supports a kindergarten, a primary school and a yeshiva, while Chabad Lubavitch finances an elementary school.

But the Judische Oberschule, with 420 pupils today, is still the only school of its kind in Germany, a cosmopolitan Tower of Babel employing 42 teachers, one-third of whom are Jewish.

Although the monthly tuition fee of 390 euros may deter some parents, the school has a waiting list.

Seventy per cent of the student body is Jewish, with 55 per cent of the Jewish students being the sons and daughters of immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

Two of the Jewish students are Israelis, their parents working in Israel's embassy.

By Witting's estimate, 20 per cent of the Jewish pupils are of mixed Jewish-Christian parentage.

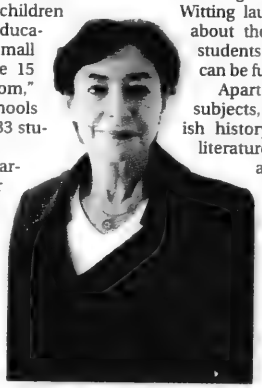
Thirty per cent of the students are Christians or Muslims, noted Witting. "We don't want to be a ghetto here," she said. Several reasons account for the fact that Christian, and two Turkish Muslim, parents send their children to this unique school.

For some families, it is merely a question of convenience, she said. "Some of the families live close to the school."

Parents who want their children to get the best possible education are impressed by the small classroom sizes. "We have 15 to 24 students per classroom," said Witting. "At other schools in the city, there are 32 to 33 students in each classroom."

A number of Christian parents who've enrolled their children in the school are animated by the force of history. As Witting put it, "Some families had a Nazi past and want their kids to learn the value of tolerance."

In one particular case, a German family that had worked for a Catholic institution in Israel wanted their child to continue learning Hebrew.



Barbara Witting

A classroom in the Judische Oberschule

The language of instruction in the school is German, but all students, regardless of faith, take Hebrew and Jewish religious classes.

Elaborating on one facet of this issue, Witting launched into a discussion about the importance of Russian students learning German so they can be fully integrated into society.

Apart from the usual secular subjects, students are taught Jewish history, tradition, philosophy, literature and the Holocaust, and are required to participate in annual field trips to Israel and Poland.

Full-day programs are held on the anniversary of Kristallnacht and Israel Independence Day.

A kosher lunch is served in the cafeteria, and Jewish holidays are observed. "We try to strengthen the Jewish identity of Jewish students," said Witting.

She takes pride that the students hail from 18 different countries. "They have to learn to live together. We also want them to be loyal to Israel."

"A lot of our kids go to Israel after finishing," she said. "Several make aliyah, and some go into the Israeli army."

To the best of her knowledge, four students have converted to Judaism in the 10 years she has been at the school. "But we don't encourage conversions."

Witting herself appears to be a prime example of the open-minded, pluralistic person the school hopes to cultivate.

Born in the United States, she is the scion of German Jews who suffered under Nazism. Her father left Germany in 1938 on a kindertransport. Her mother survived in hiding in Cologne during the Nazi era.

In 1954, when Witting was three years old, she and her parents left the United States and settled in Germany.

"I've been living most of my life in Germany," said Witting, who's married to a German. "My identity is, first, Jewish. I'm a German Jew. I don't feel close to the United States anymore. My life is here."

Is your retirement money in good hands?

Many people over 50 and even 60 have a large portion of their investments in volatile equities. Others are invested in low paying GICs. There is another option to consider. With the Romspen Fund you can have both your investment and RRSP accounts growing into a comfortable retirement nest egg.

The Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund has always delivered compound monthly interest returns of no less than 8% annually. The mortgage portfolio as of June 30, 2011 has increased by 45% to $651 million in the past year as more investors learn of the successful record of the Romspen management team.

Consistent returns month after month, year after year. Now that's something you can hold on to.

Rabbi raises awareness about Mercaz, Masorti

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

As the new executive director of Mercaz-Canada and the Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism, Rabbi Jennifer Gorman is working to increase awareness of the two organizations in Conservative congregations.

Although both organizations are affiliated with the Conservative movement, Rabbi Gorman says there are "a lot of people who don't realize that Masorti isn't [the] United Synagogue [of Conservative Judaism], and that Mercaz-Canada exists separate from Masorti."

Mercaz-Canada is the Conservative movement's Zionist organization, and the Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism supports the work of Israel's Masorti movement, which is affiliated with the Conservative movement.

"I think there's a lot of confusion over who we are and what we do."

The rabbi took on her new dual role in June, replacing Marilyn Cohen, who has retired, after working with her for a month.

Previously, Rabbi Gorman was director of youth activities for the eastern Canadian region of United Synagogue Youth and congregational consultant for the northeastern district of USCJ. She also taught at United Synagogue Day School (now Robbins Hebrew Academy) and served as family educator and program co-ordinator of the Institute for Jewish Family Living at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

A mother of three who was ordained at the Jewish Theological Seminary in 1996, Rabbi Gorman is married to Rabbi Sean Gorman, spiritual leader of the Pride of Israel Synagogue.

In an interview at her Toronto office, Rabbi Gorman stressed the importance of membership in Mercaz-Canada, explaining that the number of its members affects the number of delegates the organization can send to the World Zionist Congress, where money is allocated both within Israel and around the world.

"In order to say the Conservative movement, and Conservative Jews, are a growing percentage of the population [in Israel] and need a larger percentage of that funding, it's important that we have representation," she said, noting that the Masorti movement in Israel doesn't receive funding from the Israeli government.

"It started as a movement primarily for North Americans and now is becoming a big choice for those born in Israel."

Although most Mercaz-Canada members pay dues through their synagogues, people can join individually too, Rabbi Gorman said.

Currently there are between 1,500 and 2,000 members across the country.

In her new role, Rabbi Gorman has begun to reach out to unaffiliated synagogues that have Conservative-type services in addition to those that are affiliated with the United Synagogue.

Among the services her office provides is "Israel-centred" programming for synagogues, including a twinning program for bar and bat mitzvah children with special needs in Israel.

Sadat, King Hussein offer model for Palestinians

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In the Oct. 2 Toronto Sun, columnist Salim Mansur drew attention to the significance of a date that was then four days away – the 30th anniversary of the assassination of Egyptian president Anwar Sadat.

"We need to recall the murder of Sadat, especially this year, given the enormity of lies leveled against Israel at the UN for obstructing the rights of Palestinians to statehood by Palestinians, their Arab-Muslim backers and their apologists in the West," Mansur wrote.

Sadat was gunned down by members of an offshoot of the Muslim Brotherhood who had infiltrated Egypt's military.

"Sadat's crime in the eyes of his enemies was his journey to Jerusalem in November 1977. In the Israeli capital, Sadat embraced Prime Minister Menachem Begin and other Jewish leaders, addressed Israelis by speaking in the Knesset, and prepared the ground for the landmark Egypt-Israel peace treaty of 1979.

"This agreement was precedent-setting for what could be expected between Israel and other Arab states and, most importantly, between Israelis and Palestinians: Mutual recognition, an end to violence with an acceptance by Palestinians of Israel and its right to be secure, and the establishment of a Palestinian state, which Palestinians had refused in 1947," Mansur argued.

In fact, Sadat wasn't killed just for daring to make peace with Israel. He was also targeted because of his persistent refusal to enshrine Sharia law, as many Islamists had been demanding. Today, Egyptian Salafists (who enjoy a large following) are making similar calls for Islamic law.

They are also urging that Egypt scrap its peace treaty with Israel, despite the fact that 30 years of (albeit cold) peace have saved Egyptians many billions of dollars in foregone arms expenditures and possibly even destructive wars. Not to mention the billions in aid that the United States has since given Egypt (about $1.3 billion per year).

For a country with serious economic problems and a growing mass of youth expecting a better life, the last thing Egypt needs is to waste more resources that it doesn't have and can't afford by voiding the treaty and returning to a state of war against Israel.

Let's remember that Sadat didn't make peace because he awoke one day to find himself a Zionist. Not at all. He reached out to Israel – and showed sincerity by addressing Israelis directly – for the sake of his own people. In so doing, he took a bold and brave step that was unprecedented.

It was followed, with similar sincerity, by only one other Arab leader: Jordan's King Hussein. Both understood that with genuine recognition (something U.S. President Barack Obama recently called on the Palestinian leadership to extend), Israel would feel safe enough to make major territorial concessions. This is the core of the "land for peace" formula of UN Security Council Resolution 242.

"Palestinians could have made peace with Israel as Sadat did back in the 1970s when there were no Jewish settlements to speak of in the West Bank," Mansur noted. Even with settlements today, peace is still achievable.

Unfortunately, unlike both Sadat and Hussein, the Palestinian leadership still refuses genuinely to recognize Israel. Though this point has been made in some previous columns, it bears repeating: by insisting upon the "right" of millions of Palestinians to live in present-day Israel, the PA is effectively calling for Israel to become another Arab state. For good measure, they insist that they will never recognize Israel as the homeland of the Jewish people. (By contrast, recent Israeli leaders, including Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, along with a large majority of Israelis are prepared to recognize a future "Palestine" as the homeland of the Palestinian people).

But without recognition – in this case the recognition by the Palestinians of the right of the Jewish people to statehood – there can be no end to the conflict that such intolerance has tragically inflicted on the region.

Sadly, Sadat and King Hussein remain the rare exceptions to this rejectionism.

Trudeau's influence on Jews examined

Sheila Dropkin
Special to The CJN

Pierre Elliot Trudeau, Canada's 15th prime minister, never gave much thought to the significant impact he had on both organized Canadian Jewry and individual Jews, Canadian historian Harold Troper said.

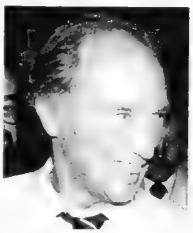
"Most Canadian Jews of the time felt that, in Trudeau, there was a leader with whom they found common cause," Troper said.

In presenting the third of a four-part lecture series on "The Canadian Jewish Community in the 1960s," co-sponsored by the Terraces of Baycrest and the Dora Gruber Endowment Fund, Troper was engaging and funny, and occasionally slipped in familiar Yiddish phrases and slightly salacious anecdotes about the flamboyant former prime minister.

As prime minister, Trudeau espoused participatory democracy as the way to make Canada a "just society," Troper said. He defended universal health care, which had been implemented just prior to his election, and he is credited with introducing Canada's multicultural policy in 1971, recognizing the plurality of cultures within a bilingual framework.

The death in September 2000 of "this man who had served Canada for over 20 years and who had advocated that all Canadians, regardless of their backgrounds, were to be treated as Canadians, resulted in an unprecedented outpouring of public grief, largely from people of non-English and non-Canadian ethnicity," Troper said.

"Trudeau never sought out Jews, but developed a high degree of comfort in their company," he added. "By the time he entered the Prime Minister's Office in 1968, he had a wide circle of Jewish contacts. His administration had more Jews than ever before, and probably since... During his years as prime minister (1968-79 and 1980-84), there were four Jewish cabinet ministers and at least one of his parliamentary secretaries, Barney Danson, was Jewish. In 1970, Trudeau named Bora Laskin to the Supreme Court of Canada, the first Jew to serve in this capacity."



Pierre Trudeau

Trudeau's rise in politics coincided with changes in the United States, whose previous "open door policy was no longer as open," Troper said. Canadians would henceforth require costly and often difficult to obtain green cards. Along with the upheaval created by the Vietnam War, race riots in the 1950s and '60s, and the election of Richard Nixon as U.S. president, this resulted in an "explosion of the number of job-hunting Jewish university graduates coming to Ottawa, where government was seen as a very good option for employment and where the action was."

The plight of Jews in the Soviet Union became more intense in 1970, when a group comprised mostly of Jews tried unsuccessfully to highjack a Soviet airliner and take it to the West. The perpetrators were harshly dealt with, and more than 10,000 Soviet Jews protested within hours of their conviction, demanding full rights in their home country or permission to emigrate. When Trudeau visited the Soviet Union the following year, he repeatedly raised the issue of the maltreatment of Soviet Jews and their lack of civil rights, and also brought with him a list of Jews seeking family reunification with relatives in Canada.

The Soviets claimed he was interfering in their internal affairs, but unofficially he prevailed upon then-premier Alexei Kosygin by inferring that other bilateral issues could be affected. The Soviets began approving emigration applications, a move that was unfortunately short-lived for other reasons.

Trudeau was acting "with his head in a hornet's mouth," Troper said, and this "put Canada's concern with human rights in the Soviet Union on the front burner, to the displeasure of his Soviet hosts. It also resulted in an enormous positive outcome for Jewish lobbying.

"Trudeau's vision of Israel must be seen as part of his belief that sovereign states must be treated as sovereign states, with control of their borders and security. He considered Israel to be a sovereign state... (but) he had limits when support for Israel blinded Canadian Jews to actions that compromised Canada's interests."

In 1978, he felt "bushwhacked" when then-Israeli prime minister, Menachem Begin brought a wish list on his state visit that included a request for Canada to move its embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, Troper said. Although Trudeau was initially open to the idea, he was concerned that moving the embassy would lead to Arab hostility against Canada, and deferred to his staff, who recommended against the move.

Begin threatened to tell Canadian Jews that Trudeau was anti-Israel and they should vote for Joe Clark in the next election, which he did. Clark promised that if he won, he'd make the move, but, Troper said, "once in office, he was caught off guard by the reaction to moving the embassy, by big business and by the Arab states."

Trudeau then "froze out" many pro-Israel lobbyists, Troper said, but never wavered in his support for Israel, although his "interests also changed and his agenda shifted to be against the occupation" in the West Bank.

"Was Trudeau good for the Jews? Yes, but not always for the organized Jewish community," he concluded.

Event supports groundbreaking UJA Federation Diverse Learning Program

Annual Max Guttmann golf tourney raises over $85,000

By Daniel Horowitz

There was no shortage of drivers, putters, wedges – or excuses – at this summer's 12th Annual UJA Max Guttmann Memorial Golf Tournament.

Funds raised through the tournament, held at Pheasant Run Golf Club, support The UJA Diverse Learning Program (DLP), a groundbreaking program that allows children with diverse learning needs to reach their potential in a Jewish environment.

The DLP, which is housed at Associated Hebrew Schools, provides children with leading edge educational approaches and support in a communal environment.

From 1983 to 2008, the Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School addressed the needs of Jewish children requiring support that exceeded the capabilities of mainstream Jewish Day Schools.

Starting with the 2008-2009 academic year, UJA Federation partnered with Associated Hebrew Schools, Netivot HaTorah Day School and TanenbaumCHAT to create special classes to accommodate students that had been attending She'arim.

Supported by transition funding from UJA Federation, the schools worked together to adapt the She'arim model which now features students integrated in mainstream classes where appropriate. Currently, Associated Hebrew Schools has 20 children, or 2 classes, remaining in grades 6 to 8.

A student of UJA's Diverse Learning Program

The more than 130 participants in this year's tournament, which was chaired by Susan Eklove, brothers Craig and Sean Guttmann, Shelli Koenigsberg and Avi Wachsman, helped raise more than $85,000 for the Diverse Learning Program.

"We are very proud to continue this golf tournament in memory of our father, Max Guttmann z"l," said Craig. "Our father believed in investing in children when they are young. He truly believed that he was saving lives and, being a Holocaust survivor, he understood how precious each life is. And the proof is in the hundreds of graduates that have gone through the program. We were saddened to see She'arim close, but we are so proud to work closely with UJA Federation which has given its complete support to ensuring that there would be a continuation of this dedicated community special education program."

Funds will ensure the continuation of high quality, customized education for children with special learning needs. In its previous 11 years of operation, the tournament has raised close to $600,000 in support of Jewish children with learning disabilities.

"This is an amazing model for learning," says Eklove, the mother of Ilan, a Grade 8 student in the DLP. "My husband and I are so grateful that Ilan is in a Jewish educational environment. Now that Ilan has seen that he can be successful, we honestly believe that the sky is the limit."

"The program is nothing short of fantastic, and it just keeps getting better," says Ellen Frischman Snyder, mother of DLP student Jordan. "Jordan is doing remarkably well and he feels good about himself. After many years of stress and concern, the program is giving us high hopes and we truly feel that we can see the light at the end of the tunnel."

A good time was had by all who took to the greens this summer at Pheasant Run Golf Club, with a wonderful day full of great golf, prizes, silent auctions, and sumptuous food, including a brisket and scotch station sponsored by Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers.

Legacy of Life

Herman Berenblum's sojourn from Germany to Toronto

By Daniel Horowitz

Call it a simple twist of fate. Beshert, if you prefer.

The fact is, if fate had not intervened in the life of a young Jewish boy living in Germany many decades ago, life for Herman Berenblum would have been very different.

It was back in the 1930s when a then-young Herman, seeking to have his visa renewed so that he could continue to live with his family in Germany, was rejected by the German authorities. As it turned out, that rejection was probably the best thing that could have happened to Herman and, by extension, Jewish Toronto.

After being forced to leave Germany as a teenager just before the start of the Holocaust, Herman said goodbye to his beloved family, a goodbye which turned out to be the last time he saw or heard from them again. Herman left Germany and made his way to Argentina, which he called home for several years. From there he travelled to England for a brief time before ultimately settling on Toronto as his new and permanent home away from home.

Like many new immigrants to Toronto, Herman found work in the shmatte business on Spadina Avenue, a trade he learned from his late father, a tailor, when Herman was a child.

But, unlike those new immigrants, the vast majority of whom lived and worked in the same part of town, Herman, looking to avoid living in a "ghetto-like atmosphere," and being reminded of the Shoah which took his family from him, chose to live in Etobicoke, a western suburb of Toronto.

Herman Berenblum ca. 1951. (Ontario Jewish Archives)

Berenblum, still experiencing culture shock and without any significant contacts, did not succeed immediately, and like many of those starting new lives in a new country, required some assistance. Sure enough, the young newcomer found that help through Toronto's organized Jewish community which not only helped him financially, but socially, as well.

Eventually, Herman, never having forgotten the people who were there for him, and in a much better financial position, wasted little time in giving back to the community.

Expressing his desire to help Jewish Toronto long after he left this world, Herman ultimately left a legacy gift in his will to the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. Because of his vision, generosity and compassion, the Foundation established two endowment funds; one to support United Jewish Appeal's Annual Campaign in perpetuity, the other, to support the ongoing needs of Holocaust survivors.

Although Herman Berenblum has passed away, his memory will live forever. In fact, the corridor of UJA Federation's Sarah & Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, which will be built on Sherman Campus at Bathurst and Sheppard, will bear his name. Photos taken by a teenaged Herman during the 1936 Berlin Olympics – some of which were displayed at the 2010 Olympic Winter Games in Vancouver - also comprise the Berenblum Photo Exhibit, which can be viewed at UJA Federation's Ontario Jewish Archives.

Toronto's entire Jewish community benefited from Herman Berenblum, and will continue to do so for years to come. And it's all because of one, small twist of fate.

Legacy of Life features the inspiring stories of outstanding individuals who, through their commitment, vision and generosity, have left an indelible imprint on our community. Consider your legacy. For information, call 416.634.3030.

In Willowdale, Liberal David Zimmer held on to the riding with 22,034 votes; Tory Vince Agovino was second with 14,428; NDPer Alexander Brown was far behind with 5,522 votes.

Contacted the morning after the election, a weary-sounding Bernie Farber credited his opponent with running a "clean campaign.

"It was a good campaign, a feisty one."

Thornhill, he said, has a history of "bucking the popular trend. It did so again this time.

"It's very tough to beat an incumbent. The incumbent has four years to shore up support. [Shurman] is popular in the Jewish community, as I am to a certain extent."

Asked if he has hurt by joining the Liberals, who adamantly reject public funding of religious schools, after he pushed the issue for years with Canadian Jewish Congress, Farber said, "My values have never changed.

"It is something I still believe in. It didn't come up at the door, except four or five times of the thousands of doors I knocked on in Thornhill."

Running for election is a "humbling" experience, Farber said. "You knock on doors and present yourself to people kind of raw. I can't think of any job where you knock on people's doors and ask, 'What do you think of me?'"

Shurman, who also proclaimed himself tired after a tough campaign, said Farber "fought hard." But Thornhill has shown in the last two provincial elections and the most recent federal vote that it is in the Tory camp, he said.

"Both myself and Peter Kent [the federal MP] are visible and hard workers... Both Peters have proven we can be strong representatives and people like to elect people who are strong on their behalf."

Jews make up 36 per cent of the riding and "the Jewish fact is crucial," he said.

Jews increasingly are gravitating to conservative parties, unlike the past when many Jews, including his own family, barely considered the Tories a viable alternative and voted Liberal almost automatically, he said.

That has changed since Stephen Harper became prime minister and people in the 905 now feel there is an alternative to the Liberals, he said.

As for his political future, Farber said he would "not close the door on anything."

He took a leave of absence to campaign, but working within the Jewish community "is my first love and passion," he said.

CIJA praises Ont. MPPs

Compiled by CJN Staff

In response to the results from the Oct. 6 Ontario provincial election, Sheldon Goodman and David Spiro, co-chairs of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, Toronto, (CIJA) joined with other Ontario Jewish communities in issuing the following statement:

"We are very pleased that several MPPs who have been very supportive of our community were re-elected. We are particularly grateful that among them are those who played a prominent leadership role in forming a cross-party consensus opposing Israel Apartheid Week. We also salute those Jewish candidates who, despite their unsuccessful bids, exemplified our community's contribution to public service.

"Last year, [Premier Dalton McGuinty] led a trade mission to strengthen burgeoning Ontario-Israel economic ties. In response, Israeli President Shimon Peres proposed measures to create a formal partnership through collaboration in research, technology and health sciences to enhance this relationship, We will work with all parties to ensure this partnership is established, and we will be reaching out to each of the party leaders to advance the full range of interests of our community in the new minority government situation."

March gets new scholarship endowment

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

March of the Living Canada recently received a gift of $500,000 from the Ben and Hilda Katz Charitable Foundation to enable more students to participate in the annual educational program, which takes students to the sites of former Nazi death camps in Poland and then on to Israel.

Anita Ekstein

Students can apply for scholarships when they sign up for the program. Online registration for the 2012 March of the Living, which runs from April 15 to 30, began Oct. 4 and will close Oct. 18. The cost per student is approximately $5,500, and students can register at marchoftheliving.org.

Harold Shneer, a board member of the Katz foundation who has been involved with the March of the Living since 1990, said he knows of no better program for young people trying to understand the Holocaust and the importance of Israel. He said he believes the program is "vital... There's a spirit that emanates from it that [participants] carry the rest of their lives."

As well, the March of the Living ties in to the Katzes' "profound belief in Jewish education for young people," said Shneer. His wife Helen is a niece to the couple, both of whom were born in Poland and died in 2000, 12 years after the establishment of their foundation.

The couple immigrated to Canada before the Holocaust and struggled at first in a small town before moving to Toronto, where Ben became a builder. A UJA Federation of Greater Toronto publication says that they had no children, but "always had a soft spot for youth" and were longstanding supporters of Holocaust education for young people.

Shneer said there was "not even a question" about whether to allocate to the March or how much to give.

Eli Rubenstein, national director of March of the Living Canada, credits Anita Ekstein, a 77-year-old child survivor of the Holocaust, for taking the initiative to establish an endowment fund in the first place.

The Canadian March of the Living Endowment Fund was established by UIA Federations Canada with the assistance of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto (part of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto). The new gift from the Katz foundation is under the umbrella of that March of the Living fund, which is housed within the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

Ekstein, who co-chairs the national March of the Living endowment fund with Heshy Altbaum, has been on the trip 11 times as a chaperone and is planning to return next April. Two years ago, she established the Frank and Anita Ekstein March of the Living Endowment Fund, named for her late husband and herself.

She said she "begged everybody" to get the endowment started six years ago, because "there are more and more kids wanting to go, and more and more [of them] need to be subsidized." More funds are still needed, she added.

Ekstein – who, at 77, is one of the younger survivors to accompany trip participants – is motivated by a sense of urgency about having as many students as possible participate "when we're here, when we're able to go with them.

"Hopefully, one day, those kids will take over," she said.

It's already difficult, she added, noting that seven busloads of Toronto teens were on last year's March, but there were only six accompanying survivors.

Ekstein said she hopes to help the program in some way as long as she can. "You can see [the kids] changing, growing, maturing during the trip."

The March has two overall goals, Rubenstein told The CJN. "We hope the students going on the trip commit to remembering the lessons of the Shoah, and will have a greater dedication to the Jewish people, to Israel and to a Jewish way of life, and to strengthening their own community."

On a broader level, the hope is that students will be motivated to fight genocide, intolerance and racism, and to build a better world, he added.

Last year, a study commissioned by the March of the Living affirmed that its alumni were deeply affected by the experience. Among other results, respondents reported increases in their sense of Jewish identity and commitment to human rights. As well, 95 per cent felt that the program made them feel well prepared to counter Holocaust denial.

Irvine verdict sends message, Canadians say

Students convicted for disrupting Israeli ambassador's speech

Dan Klein
JTA

The misdemeanour convictions of 10 California college students for disrupting a speech by Israel's ambassador to the United States is already leading partisans of both sides on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to predict changes in the way the fight over the issue plays out on campus.

"When you talk to students across college campuses, now they are pondering what is legal and what is not," said Kifah Shah, spokeswoman of a solidarity group for the guilty students, Stand With the Eleven. "This has a chilling effect."

In February 2010, 11 Muslim students stood one by one and interrupted a speech by Ambassador Michael Oren at the University of California, Irvine. Oren twice walked off the stage as students shouted "Mass murderer!" and "War criminal!" before they were removed from the room by campus police. A planned question-and-answer session following the address was dropped.

Late last month, an Orange County jury found 10 Muslim students guilty of two misdemeanour charges for conspiring to disrupt a meeting and then disrupting the speech. They were sentenced to community service and probation. Charges against the 11th student were dropped in August.

During the trial, prosecutor Dan Wagner described the students as "censors" who utilized the "heckler's veto."

"This is about freedom of speech," Wagner said in his closing statement. "That's why we're all here."

Michael Oren

Some supporters of Israel express hope that the verdict will make campus protesters think twice before disrupting Israeli speakers, which has become a common tactic of pro-Palestinian activists.

In 2008, at York University, Students Against Israeli Apartheid protested loudly during a speaking engagement by former Israeli deputy prime minister Natan Sharansky.

Hillel of Greater Toronto released a statement two days later that said "both Mr. Sharansky and members of the audience were harassed and intimidated in an unsuccessful attempt to shut down the event."

In 2009, hecklers at the University of Chicago repeatedly disrupted a speech by former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert.

Most recently, a Sept. 1 performance by the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra was interrupted repeatedly by protesters at London's Royal Albert Hall, forcing the BBC to stop its broadcast of the concert.

At UC Irvine, the campus Muslim Student Union, which organized the heckling, was suspended for a year by the school for violating its code of conduct, although four months later, the suspension was changed to probation on appeal.

A year after the disruption of Oren's speech, the Orange County District Attorney's Office pressed charges against the students who were involved.

The Orange County Jewish Federation & Family Services in Southern California issued a statement praising the jury's verdict. Federation CEO Shalom Elcott said the response by university administrators and the district attorney has had a positive effect on the campus climate.

"It has already had a significant impact on campuses," he said. "I think it has already created a situation on campus where other student groups have to be more careful about their behaviour. It is creating more civil behaviour."

The protesters' supporters, however, have accused the prosecutor of trying to suppress political speech. Muslim groups blasted the verdict against the students.

"It's a sad day for democracy when nonviolent protesters are criminalized by their government and are found guilty for exercising a constitutional right," Salam Al-Marayati, president of the Los Angeles-based Muslim Public Affairs Council, said in a statement.

But Canadian Jewish campus groups feel that it's the pro-Israel students who are being victimized by protesters who prevent invited guests from speaking on campuses.

Canadian Federation of Jewish Students' vice-president of external relations Emile Scheffel, speaking on behalf of Hillel of Greater Toronto, said it's well known that Jewish and pro-Israel students in Canada face hostility and intimidation from anti-Israel groups.

Student apologizes for Mengele costume prank

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The Université de Montréal says it considers the matter closed after a law student who dressed up as notorious Nazi Dr. Josef Mengele – including wearing a swastika armband – apologized.

The student, who was not identified, wore the costume during frosh week activities Aug. 22. He will not face any disciplinary measures.

On Sept. 13, the student issued a written apology, which the university accepted. He also reportedly removed the costume after objections were made by some observers and expressed regret at any offence given at that time.

"As far as the administration is concerned, the case is closed," Danielle Pinard, a vice-dean of the law faculty, said. She said the university conducted a non-disciplinary probe into the matter, which included speaking with at least four eyewitnesses.

The incident won't be included in the student's university record, she said.

Students had been asked to wear a costume incorporating a health-sciences theme and the colour red on the first day of class.

His outfit reportedly also included a Hitler-style moustache, a white lab coat with red handprints and the name "Mengele" across the back.

The Jewish law student's group, the Association des étudiants juifs en droit de l'Université de Montréal raised the issue with the dean of law, Gilles Trudeau.

It has accepted the student's apology and is satisfied with the way the university handled the matter.

"The faculty handled this superbly," said AEJD co-president Jillian Friedman. "This kid, he really didn't do it out of malice. He had no idea this could be so hurtful."

The Association des étudiants en droit de l'Université de Montréal also objected to the student's get-up, but has now laid the matter to rest.

Conviction first of its kind

"Interestingly, this is the first such incident I've seen that has resulted in a criminal conviction. While we support everyone's freedom to speak their mind, we agree that right does not extend to preventing others from exercising their rights," Scheffel said.

"The real 'chilling effect' in this equation is the reluctance of Jewish and pro-Israel groups to bring speakers to campus for fear of disruption. I think that is exactly the intention of anti-Israel groups – to suppress competing opinions through intimidation, just like so many of the regimes that surround Israel."

Hasbara at York president Oriyah Barzilay said she hopes the conviction will send a clear message to students on Canadian campuses that disruptive behaviour will no longer be tolerated.

"The misconduct by the students was abhorrent, distasteful, and certainly punishable... it demonstrated their lack of seriousness and legitimacy regarding the subject," she said.

"It set the precedent for other universities that anti-Israel, or antisemitic students cannot use the heckler's veto to stomp on a basic right such as freedom of speech."

Barzilay added that the only way to understand the other perspective is through dialogue, and she hopes that students will realize that the heckler's veto "is fundamentally wrong and will be met with stiff consequences.

"One can only hope that these convictions will encourage university administrators to step outside their comfort zone of inaction and passivity, and once and for all be resolute in enforcing the policies and laws that our free and democratic society holds so dear."

The 10 students convicted on charges of disrupting Oren's speech were sentenced by Superior Court Judge Peter Wilson to 56 hours of community service and three years of probation, though the probation will be reduced to one year if they complete their community service by Jan. 31. Wilson said that jail time was not warranted because the students were "motivated by their beliefs and did not disrupt for the sake of disrupting."

Advocates for the students vow to appeal the convictions.

The dean of UC Irvine's law school, Erwin Chemerinsky, told the Los Angeles Times that the prosecution of the students was "divisive" and that their convictions were "harsh," although he also said, "It's not a matter of free speech, because there's no free speech right to shut someone down."

The lesson of the sukkah?

Rabbi Edward Elkin

Only four days separate Yom Kippur from Sukkot, yet in many ways, no two holidays could be more different. Yom Kippur is a solemn day, while Sukkot is Zman Simchateinu – the season of our joy. On Yom Kippur, we refrain from eating, while on Sukkot, meals in the sukkah are one of the central observances. On Yom Kippur, God is our Judge, but on Sukkot we give thanks to God for being the true shelter and protection in our lives.

As different as they are, the proximity of these two holidays on our calendar leads us to look for connections between the two. One connection is found in the book of Jonah, which is read on Yom Kippur afternoon. The end of the book finds Jonah just outside Nineveh, the capital of the Assyrian empire. Jonah has just finished preaching repentance to the Ninevites, and he decides to wait and see what happens next. Will God destroy the people of Nineveh for their sins, as He threatened? Or will God forgive them in response to their repentance? While Jonah waits to discern their fate, he decides to build – a sukkah.

What is the meaning of this sukkah? On one level, it has a practical function: it provides Jonah with shade. Yet, oddly enough, God then causes a plant to sprout up that is also said to provide shade. When the plant withers, Jonah is exposed to the sun. So, what happened to the sukkah? It had to have had another purpose besides providing protection from the blazing sun.

Rabbinic Reflections

I think the key to understanding Jonah's sukkah may be found in what he does when he is inside it. We read that after Jonah makes the sukkah, he sits down in it order to see what will happen to Nineveh. Jonah's sukkah is a place made for seeing. Jonah hopes that God will destroy Nineveh, and that cataclysmic destruction is the sight he hopes to behold. He doesn't get his wish. As Jonah fears, God forgives the Ninevites, and spares the city. Jonah, sitting in his sukkah, wants to die.

A sukkah is by definition a temporary shelter, a place where we stay when we're not at home. As such, it's a place where we have the opportunity to gain a different perspective on our lives and on the world than the one we have when we are in our usual dwelling place. Jonah, however, doesn't take advantage of that opportunity. At the beginning of the story, he wants to see the downfall of Nineveh. And that's where he ends up, even after his dramatic experience in the belly of the fish.

If we learn from Jonah that the sukkah is a place of seeing, a place of discernment, can we find a way to really open our eyes in it as he did not? Can we try to see things differently than we did before? Following the dramatic atonement experience of Yom Kippur, can we achieve the insight to perceive how we can be better, kinder, more generous and forgiving people in the year ahead?

Rabbi Edward Elkin is spiritual leader of the First Narayever Congregation in Toronto.

Roman Israel, Part III

The Roman period in Israel was an important phase in the history of the land and its people. It saw the transition from the biblical to the medieval period. In the process, there were two traumatic revolts against the rule of Rome. The first resulted in the destruction of the Second Temple, while the second, under the leadership of the charismatic Simon Bar Kochba, led to the death of the great Rabbi Akiva, who had initially believed Bar Kochba to be the Messiah.

All of this would result in an even larger Jewish Diaspora than had existed before. But there was an even greater impact on the religious topography of the land. Ultimately, two faiths emerged from the boiling religious cauldron that was Judea before the first revolt against Rome.

The first was Pharisaic Judaism, which would evolve into the Judaism of today. The other was an obscure group that coalesced around the teachings of a charismatic Galilean whom we now call Jesus. It was this group, under the leadership of a former Pharisee known as Saul of Tarsus, that would dramatically alter the religious landscape of the Roman Empire.

It was Saul – or Paul, as he came to be called – who took the group's initial Jewish message to the gentiles. It was a message that would make this little-known Jewish sect, which came to be called Christianity, the largest religion in the world today.

In the process, the Romans also changed the archaeological landscape of Israel. It's a landscape I'll be exploring when I lead an archeological tour of Israel this summer. The tour is part of the Jewish/Italian Friendship Project, which I helped to initiate with both the Italian and Israeli consuls general.

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

The project has already brought over Dr. Edward Goldberg, who started the phenomenal Medici Archive Project, which is digitizing more than three million documents from the archives of this magnificent family, who played such a tremendous role in the Italian Renaissance that ushered in the modern age. Amazingly, more than 60,000 of these documents deal with the Jews of Tuscany.

But so far, the highlight of the Jewish/Italian Project is its adoption of a new archelogical excavation in Israel at Tel Huqoq in the Galilee. The site dates from the Roman period and is mentioned in Christian writings. It's two kilometres from Migdal, the home of Mary Magdalene.

But even more fascinating for Jews is the fact that Huqoq contains a synagogue awaiting excavation. It's the perfect project for this wonderful initiative, because it unites all the elements we want to emphasize. The Roman and Christian elements speak to the Italian aspect, while the synagogue highlights the Jewish connection.

One of the high points of the tour will be an in-depth visit to the site, where we will have a chance to speak with the staff as they explain the important work they're doing. It's a wonderful opportunity to celebrate the warm and cordial relationship between our two communities.

The time for joy

The holiday of Sukkot has several different names in Jewish literature. The one we're most familiar with is Sukkot, since it refers to the temporary huts we build and dwell in during the holiday. Another name, Chag Ha'asif, the Holiday of Gathering, refers to the harvest aspect of the holiday and the gathering of the nation for one of the three Pilgrimage Festivals. Yet another name, Zman Simchateinu, the Time of Our Happiness, is somewhat more subtle in its meaning than the other names. It seems not to directly connect with any of the themes of Sukkot.

There is certainly the theme of unity that gets expressed during Sukkot through the ritual of lulav and etrog. Both the lulav and the etrog are representative of different kinds of Jewish people. Some have heightened spirituality, some do not. Some engage intellectually, others engage emotionally, and still others don't engage at all. We hold them all together with the lulav and etrog to represent that we're not complete as a nation unless we are able to bring all these people together in harmony.

Another theme for the holiday is one of understanding how fragile our security is in today's world. It wouldn't take much for the average person to lose everything and rely on the compassion of God and fellow human beings. Sukkot reminds us that materialism is never as permanent or comforting as the connection with God and each other.

The third name for the holiday, Zman Simchateinu, refers to the holiday of happiness. It subtly raises the unasked question: shouldn't we be happy on all the holidays?

Midrashic Moments

Rachael Turkienicz

Except for the two holidays of Yom Kippur and Tisha b'Av on which we fast, there should be an element of joy within all Jewish ritual. What makes Sukkot the one to get the name Time of Our Happiness?

Sukkot happens to be the holiday that comes right after Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. Both Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are the culmination of all the soulful searching of Elul, the previous month. It's quite easy to carry these emotions past Yom Kippur into Sukkot and beyond. Every moment could be filled with trepidation and danger as we wonder if we were successful on Yom Kippur. Sukkot speaks to this theme of worry, since we believe it's the time when the world is judged for the amount of water that will fall that year. Given floods, tsunamis and the like, we could easily focus on this element of Sukkot.

By calling it Zman Simchateinu, we're clearly reminded that we can choose where our focus lies. Rather than focusing on the negative, we change our view and remember the happiness and the joy.

The sages remind us that the same choice exists within all our spiritual choices. When the rabbis say: 'Worship God through joy," the statement of choice is clear. If one engages with God out of guilt or pressure, the sages would question whether that was worship at all. The High Holidays and their intensity conclude in Sukkot, when we refocus our thoughts and find the positive in Judaism, each other and spiritual engagement.

Sukkot food: get stuffed

Sukkot is almost here, and like during most Jewish holidays, it's time to get stuffed. But I'm not just talking about the revellers; I'm referring to the foods themselves. Sukkot – along with Hoshanah Rabah and Simchat Torah – has a long and interesting relationship with stuffed foods.

Why the connection? Rabbi Mark Hurvitz offers this culinary metaphor. Sukkot "includes the notion of welcoming guests – both living and historical heroes – into the sukkah, thus "stuffing" them into a wrapper of sorts." [http://bit.ly/stuffed01] Ruth Heiges suggests stuffed vegetables are like "miniature cornucopia symbolizing the plenty with which we have been blessed and for which we hope throughout the coming new year." [http://bit.ly/stuffed02]

Gil Marks writes that "stuffed vegetables, a most ancient Sukkot dish that probably has its genesis with the grape leaves remaining on the vine after the harvest that were then filled and simmered until tender, are common sights on holiday tables in all communities. As there were few or no grapes in much of northern and eastern Europe, the prevalent cabbage became a handy substitute." Marks includes recipes for Yaprakites de Peshe (Greek Fish in Grape Leaves), Zarkhop (Bukharan Lamb Stew with Vegetables) and Inferike (Syrian Meat and Potato Casserole). [http://bit.ly/stuffed03]

Browse through the Sukkot section of one of the premier Jewish cooking sites, and you'll find dozens of recipes for stuffing just about any vegetable – and fruit – you can think of: squash, zucchini, artichokes, eggplants, avocados, tomatoes, beets and dates. And, of course, the cabbage. [http://bit.ly/stuffed04]

Lovers of stuffed cabbage may encounter a semantic barrier as they surf for a favourite recipe. "Philologos," the linguistic columnist for the Forward, did an entire piece on how your name for a dish depends on where your family hails from. Letter writer Milton Lasky responded, "Whether you call it Prakas, Golubtzi, Holubtsi, Holeptshes, Gulomkes, Oleshkes, or whatever is really immaterial. My Mother… called it 'Gevilkte Cabbage' (Rolled Cabbage) and that was good enough for me, providing what was rolled into the cabbage leaves." [http://bit.ly/stuffed05]

Jewish & Digital

If the filled food tradition appeals to you, but you are looking beyond cabbage rolls for your festive dinner, you do have some untraditional options. "Try meat-stuffed tomatoes, pesto-stuffed mushrooms, cheesy stuffed zucchini (the round ones are astonishing for stuffing), and baked stuffed nectarines for dessert… Strudels are an additional difference on the stuffed theme. You can take this in many separate directions – stuff with meat, sautéed eggplant and mushrooms, tuna or fruit." [http://bit.ly/stuffed07]

Another filled food associated with the holiday are kreplach, dumplings traditionally eaten on the seventh day of Sukkot, Hoshanah Rabah. Hoshanah Rabah is when each person's judgment that had been written on Rosh Hashanah and sealed on Yom Kippur is finally handed over to the angel – giving us one last chance to repent. [http://bit.ly/stuffed08] So what's the connection to the humble kreplach? Judgment (symbolized by meat) is clothed in kindness (symbolized by the dough). [http://bit.ly/stuffed09]

Now that you know the reason, you can take your pick of 13 kreplach recipes in the Jewish Food Archives, including beef, chicken liver, kasha, cheese and bite-size. [http://bit.ly/stuffed11]

Have a very ful-filling holiday.

Show to aid disabled children, adults

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Autism In the Arts, a show featuring the artwork of children and adults with complex disabilities, will be presented on Oct. 22 at the Riviera Parque in Concord.

The show is part of the fourth international Come to Your Senses conference hosted by the Muki Baum Treatment Centres for children and adults with complex disabilities.

The conference, which hopes to attract professionals, researchers, educators, parents, caregivers and people with disabilities, will include workshops, keynote addresses, poster presentations and experiential workshops.

Topics include sensory in the classroom, vision, sexuality, schizophrenia, aging, music therapy, mind-body connection, social inclusion, nutrition and views from inside autism spectrum disorders.

Presenters will hail from such countries as Israel, Italy, Mexico, Australia, Japan, the United Kingdom, Slovenia, South Africa, the United States and Canada.

The Autism in the Arts evening will feature a film screening of This is My Child, by Israeli documentary filmmakers Aviv Hurvitz and Kastina Productions, about five families in Israel who are dealing with the challenges of autism from diagnosis onward. The film will be followed by a discussion with Hurvitz and some of the featured families.

Einat Enbar, manager of marketing and communications for the Muki Baum Centres, said that the art program is an important aspect of the Muki Baum Treatment Centres, "because art can touch us and enable us to express who we are. This is also true for people with complex disabilities.

"The arts allow individuals with various challenges to enjoy art both passively as part of the audience and actively as creators. They can actualize their artistic potential and demonstrate that artistic talent can shine through disability," she said.

In other news, Muki Baum has been chosen as a featured charity for this year's Scotiabank Toronto Waterfront Marathon, on Oct. 16.

Team Match Muki is challenging families, staff and friends to participate in the event, which will raise money for Muki Baum programs and services.

Team Match Muki was created three years ago when 30 participants raised more than $17,000. This year's goal is 100 participants raising a minimum of $60,000.

For information, call the centre at 416-630-2222.

Aerobic activity improves brain health

We have known for a long time that exercise in general has many benefits for your body, but did you know that moderate aerobic activity has been found to improve brain function?

Fitness Corner

Felyce Zomparelli

A recent scientific-literature review of more than 1,600 research papers that was published in the internal medicine journal Mayo Clinic Proceedings found that any aerobic activity that raises the heart rate, increasing the body's need for oxygen, can slow the decline of cognitive function and help to reduce the risk of dementia.

Normal aging causes the brain to shrink, affecting neurogenesis (the production of new brain cells) and neuronal connections. The average adult brain produces several thousand new neurons each day. As we age, the survival of these new neurons is heavily influenced by factors such as hormonal changes, environmental stimulation, active learning and exercise. Physical activity, especially aerobic activity, has been found to play an essential role in neurogenesis and overall brain health.

A 2010 study found that regular walking alone was enough to slow the rate of cognitive decline. Recently, it was also found that aerobic exercise better maintained brain neuronal connections as well as improved cognitive testing scores in both healthy seniors and those with cognitive impairment. Physical activity improves the flow of oxygen-rich blood to the brain.

Researchers at Columbia University found that middle-aged people who exercise an hour a day, four days a week, showed increased volumes of both the brain cortex and the hippocampus (area of the brain responsible for memory). Other studies have suggested that endorphins, which are released during exercise, play a crucial role in increasing neuron production in the brain.

The latest evidence shows a strong association between regular physical activity and brain health with aging. It also reduces the risk of cognitive decline, dementia and Alzheimer's. Exercising at just 60 per cent of your maximum heart rate, 150 minutes a week or 30 minutes a day, is all you need to protect your brain and memory.

DECORATING THE SUKKAH: As part of a unit on Getting Along and Belonging, Grade 1 students at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, made cards and decorated Mount Sinai Hospital's sukkah, which patients and staff will visit during Sukkot. Standing on either side of the sukkah with the students and accompanying parent volunteers are teachers Shira Wolch, on the left side, and Lori Shapero-Press.

Holocaust symposium held in Welland, Ont.

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The sixth annual Holocaust Symposium and Anti-Discrimination Day – an event that presents hundreds of Niagara region students with testimony and workshops that highlight the dangers of prejudice and indifference – began with a teacher's ambition to improve upon a mandatory bullying lesson.

Rachel Gracey, an intermediate teacher with the District School Board of Niagara, said the symposium, which will once again host a capacity crowd of more than 350 students and teachers, was inspired by an outdated bullying lesson she had to give to her eighth-grade class.

"The first year that I was teaching Grade 8, I received a binder full of bullying lessons," said Gracey, who has been teaching for 14 years.

"I read through them, and I thought, 'Oh my God, these are terrible.' They were really kind of cheesy lessons."

Gracey said that a lesson on bullying is very important, but she felt the material wasn't age appropriate for her students, who had sat through variations of the same lesson each year since they were in kindergarten.

"And yet, the words that I was hearing coming out of their mouths [in the schoolyard] were really discriminatory and prejudicial. I thought, 'If they've had all these lessons, why aren't they working?'"

She said in most cases, students were using language they may not have realized was rooted in racism.

"I thought, 'If the bullying lessons aren't working, and if we don't understand what is prejudicial, then we should go all the way back to cases that are really bad,'" Gracey said.

"Of course, the Holocaust is the world's worst example of how far bullying can go and how important it was for people to stand up and not be bystanders."

She put together a program based on the Holocaust using information she felt was appropriate for grades 7 and 8 students. She used that information to teach her students what bullying can lead to.

"And then it kind of just blew up."

In the six years that Gracey has been working to organize the annual symposium, she has participated in a March of the Living tour for educators and attended an international Holocaust education conference in Jerusalem in 2008.

The following year, Gracey was invited to join the National Task Force on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research, a three-year initiative funded by the Canadian government.

She said that some in her community are surprised to learn that she is heading a Holocaust education event, although she isn't Jewish.

"I just think it's important. It happens to be the Holocaust, but it could be about Bosnia, or it could be about Cambodia, or about Darfur. It just happens to be that there is a lot of information for teachers to use and go back to their classrooms to teach age-appropriate information about the period."

This year, Gracey said she is looking forward to welcoming 13 speakers who will take part in the symposium, which will be held Nov. 2 at Centennial Secondary School in Welland, Ont.

Among the speakers are Kathy Kacer – an author who wrote a book about the St. Louis, a ship carrying nearly 1,000 Jews from Germany in 1939 that was forced to turn back to Europe when no country would accept them – and Lara Brady, the niece of Hana Brady, who was immortalized by the children's Holocaust story Hana's Suitcase.

Rachel Gracey

The workshop leaders include Holocaust survivors Andy Reti and Faigie Libman, and teachers Rosalie Samosh and Anne Converset.

Gracey said her students were taking the lessons they learned at school home with them, which led them to discover their own connections to the Holocaust.

She said one student learned that her family was originally Dutch and discovered that her grandparents had hid a Jew from the Nazis during the war.

"It was interesting to see how much learning was happening outside of school and the discussions that were happening in families," Gracey said.

The event also explores other examples of discrimination.

"We have a speaker who'll be talking about homophobia, there is a group from Grimsby, [Ont.], who do work with grandmothers in Africa who will talk about HIV and AIDS discrimination. Another will talk about the discrimination he experienced in his home country of Zimbabwe," Gracey said.

She said she's encouraged by the enthusiasm her students show when learning about the Holocaust, but is discouraged by the fact that genocides have occurred time after time in the 71 years since the end of World War II.

"We really didn't learn any lessons, as horrible as that is to say. My goal is that kids will refuse to live in a world in which this can continue to happen. Maybe then we will learn the lessons."

Some Palestinians accept Jewish Israel: envoy

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Elements within the Palestinian Authority (PA) accept Israel's Jewish character, but don't expect them to go public about it, Israel's new envoy in Montreal suggested at a recent panel discussion at the YM-YWHA Ben Weider JCC.

Joel Lion

Such acceptance, in the view of Consul General Joel Lion, is for the time being best reserved for behind-closed-doors discussions when Israel and Palestinians sit down to "talk tachlis" about peace.

"There are elements within the [PA] who are ready to accept the Jewish nature of Israel," Lion said to a crowd of 300 just after a live talk via satellite Oct. 2 between former New York governor Eliot Spitzer and Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz broadcast from New York's 92nd Street Y.

"I can't give you names. They would be killed tomorrow. [But] the point is they are there," Lion said.

"[Israeli President] Shimon Peres said there are two things you do not make in public: love and peace."

Lion was joined on the panel – moderated by CJAD radio's Tommy Schnurmacher – by Beth Israel Beth Aaron's Rabbi Reuben Poupko and Sara Saber-Freedman, executive vice-president of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Lion gave a nuanced if unconventional take on the current Mideast situation, saying, for example, that Israelis themselves "do not accept Israel as a Jewish state," since that would mean a state "ruled by Halachah."

"The point is that we are talking about a state [as] the homeland of the Jewish nation," Lion said.

Just as Israel is expected to recognize a Palestinian "nation" entitled to a homeland, Lion said, Palestinians are also expected to recognize and accept Jewish nationhood, the Jewish "nature" and "character" of Israel as part of negotiations, he said.

Lion said he thinks Palestinian efforts to have the United Nations recognize Palestine as a state actually ranked fifth behind other Israeli concerns: first is Iran's quest for nuclear capability, followed by Egypt's succumbing to Islamic and other extremism, then by restoring positive relations with Turkey and the increasing instability in Lebanon and Syria.

What's been happening at the UN has been an Israeli "pre-occupation," said Lion, "but not number 1."

The panelists didn't agree on all the issues they discussed.

Rabbi Poupko, for example, said that Europe is a "disaster" in terms of burgeoning antisemitism and that it has returned to its "normal state," while Lion said the level of antisemitism in Europe has actually been stable "since the 1950s."

Lion said the antisemitism that does exist in Europe reaches down to "the darkest part of Europe's soul."

Freedman noted that for all the publicity it has received, the boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel has pretty much been a dud locally.

She referred to those encouraging the boycott of the Le Marcheur and Na'ot shoe stores on St. Denis Street as "thugs."

The best way to fight efforts to delegitimize Israel and to fight antisemitism, Lion said, is to build coalitions and to use the "virtual world."

On Iran, Freedman pointed to the need to differentiate between the government of Iran and its people.

"There are Iranians in Canada who have extended hands of friendship toward us," she said. "There are Iranians here who are our friends and allies."

Lion said Israel is not prepared to show all its "aces" in regard to Iran, which is often described as being two years away from devoping a nuclear weapon, but he said pressure on Iran in the form of economic sanctions needs to be maintained. "The pressure is working."

Rabbi Poupko added that Israel has been "effective" in fighting Iran's drive to nuclear capability by "assassinating [Iranian] scientists." Lion interjected immediately: "I never said it!"

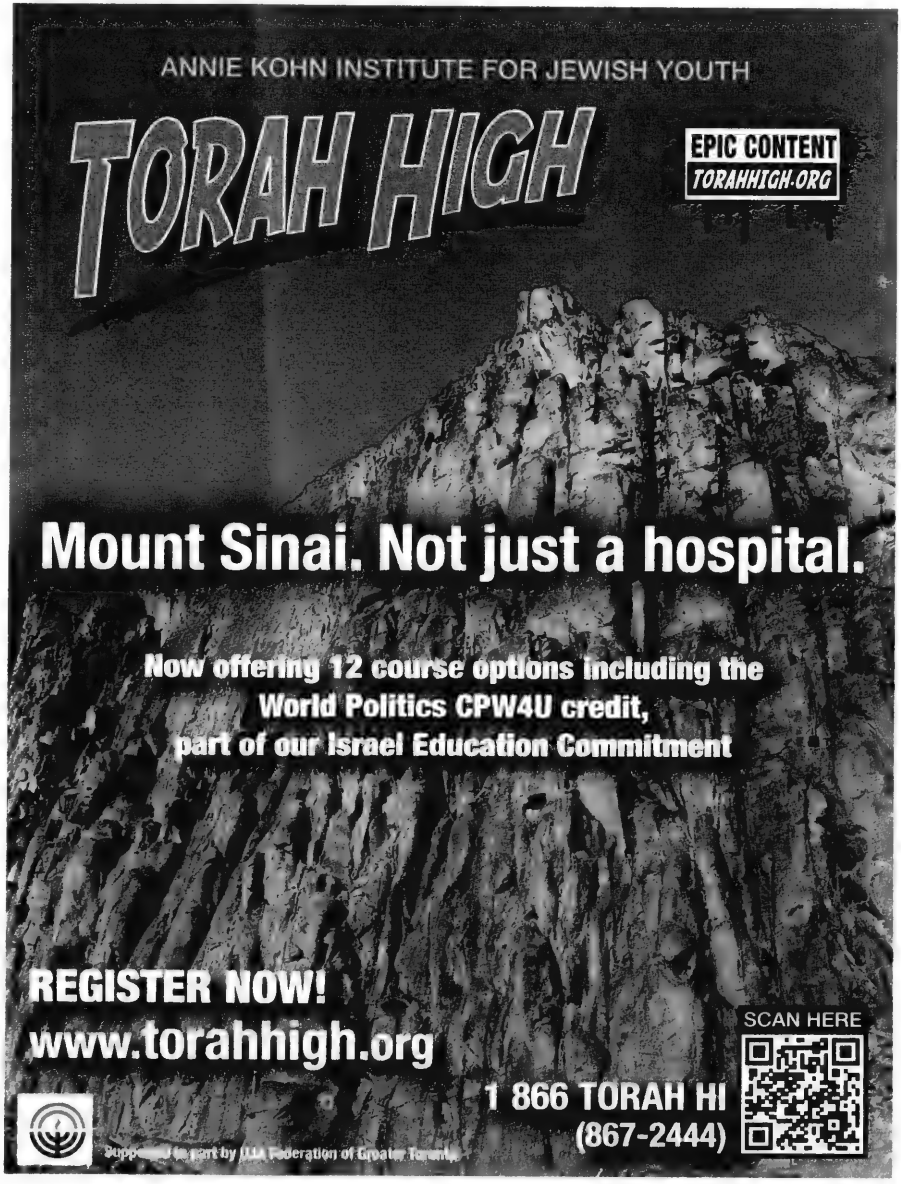
The animated conversation between Dershowitz and Spitzer covered a wide range of issues, not all of which related to the Middle East, despite the billing for the event, which was transmitted to 28 North American cities.

Dershowitz criticized PA President Mahmoud Abbas for refusing to "recognize any Jewish history in the Middle East," and accused the Palestinians of wanting "land without peace."

He also defended the recent U.S. targeted killing of American-Yemeni imam Anwar al-Awlaki, an Islamist linked to recruiting for Al Qaeda.

"He was an enemy combatant as well as guilty of treason," Dershowitz said.

He also predicted that Egypt would never dare to break its peace treaty with Israel. "It wouldn't be a six-day war. It would be a three-day war," he said.



Rabbi heads initiative to interpret Rogatchover Gaon's work

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Most Jews probably wouldn't recognize the name of Rabbi Yosef Rosen.

But Rabbi Rosen – better known as the Rogatchover Gaon because he was born in Rogatchev (now Belarus) – is revered in talmudic circles and the haredi world as one of the greatest talmudic figures in history.

Now, the name of Rabbi Rosen, who died in 1936, is gaining new currency in light of Montreal serving as the main base for an exhaustive, renewed effort to decipher 6,000 of his commentaries – one by one, word by word, sentence by sentence.

It's a race against time, because the condition of the works has been deteriorating for decades.

Ironically, all came within a hair's breadth of being lost in the Holocaust.

In fact, they were physically destroyed, but 70-year-old microfilms remain and are being methodically recovered, scanned, enlarged, enhanced and newly scrutinized.

Rabbi Yosef Rosen

"It is an incredible undertaking," said Rabbi Moshe Baron, a Montreal native now living in London, England, who is director of the project.

"The Rogatchover Gaon is considered the Einstein of the Torah community," he said.

The late Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Schneerson credited the Rogavotcher Gaon with "brilliantly shaping general rules for every single concept in Torah study."

Heading the initiative locally is Rabbi Avraham Benshimon, dean of the Kollel Ledayanus at St. Laurent's Petah Tikvah synagogue and a faculty member at the Chaya Mushka Seminary.

Rabbi Baron described Rabbi Benshimon as arguably the only scholarly figure around with the patience, willingness and ability to distil, explain, interpret and annotate the Rogatchover Gaon's commentaries in a way that for the first time makes them accessible and understandable not only outside the haredi world, but inside it as well.

Inside that world, only a small number of its most scholarly figures have the ability to mine through the commentaries' abstruse complexities.

"When commentaries cite a source," Rabbi Benshimon has explained, "they [usually] bring down a few words about what they're referring to.

"But the Rogatchover Gaon never [spelled out] what he's referring to on a page, or sometimes in an entire chapter."

Another member of the team is Rabbi M.M. Tenenbaum, who has spent decades deciphering the Rogatchover Gaon's sfarim and other writings.

The team has also re-created an institute named after his writings, called Tzafnat Paneach (www.tzafnat.com), to research and carry on the work.

Last winter, Rabbi Benshimon finished a third volume on the Gaon's commentaries on Maimonides' legal code that was released by Israel's prestigious Mosad Harav Kook publishing house.

The commentaries are steeped in history, scholarship and tragedy, as the website makes clear.

When Rabbi Rosen (the Gaon) died in Vienna in 1936 after surgery, his daughter, Rachel Citron, returned from Palestine to Dvinsk, Latvia, where he had worked, to assemble his unpublished manuscripts with the help of Rabbi Alter Safern Fuchs, Rabbi Rosen's disciple.

They only managed to publish two volumes in print before rushing to avoid the forthcoming Nazi onslaught by microfilming thousands of pages of the Gaon's Talmud, as well as other works and correspondence, and mailing them during 1940-41 to Rabbi Fuchs's great-uncle in New York, Rabbi Zvi Hirsch Safern, who kept them stored at his home in the Bronx.

But like virtually all others Jews in Latvia, Citron and Rabbi Fuchs ended up perishing in the Holocaust.

In 1956, Rabbi Menachem Kasher of New York's Yeshiva University came across the documents through a chance meeting with the son of Rabbi Safern's widow and founded the Zafnat Paneach Institute in the first effort to publish the Gaon's work. Four volumes appeared between 1981 and 1984, but since then, the project of deciphering and printing the Rogatchover Gaon's work has been held up until the latest initiative.

"We have chosen to take upon ourselves the sacred task of piecing the puzzle together before it is too late," Rabbi Baron said.

"The project will benefit world Jewry at large and bring to life the Torah the Rogatchover Gaon left behind."

Quebec mayor says holiday noise ban is legal

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Hampstead Mayor William Steinberg insists there's nothing illegal about the town's bylaw restricting noise on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, and he blamed the media for misinformation and fanning ill feeling.

The bylaw, in fact, is not new and has been in effect for more than a year, with no complaints until now, Steinberg said in an interview. He believes that prohibiting gas-powered lawnmowers, leaf-blowers, pneumatic drills and other noisy equipment or work on private or public property on the High Holidays is actually an even-handed rule.

The council of the municipality of 8,000 revised its nuisance bylaws, which for decades banned such outdoor noise on Sunday and all statutory holidays.

There had been objections from observant Jews, he said, who were unable to do work on their homes on Saturday. In June 2010, the bylaws were amended to allow such noise-causing activity on Saturday and Sunday between 9 a.m. and 6 p.m.

However, the council decided not to alter the holiday restrictions, but rather to extend them.

Taking into account that Hampstead's population is about 85 per cent Jewish, the council added the two days of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. Passover and other Jewish holidays aren't included.

A $1,000 fine can be levied for a first offence, and it can double for repeat offenders.

Steinberg noted that because three of the statutory holidays – namely Christmas, Good Friday and Easter Monday – are Christian, this created an equitable situation for all citizens who want peace and tranquility on days when most are not working.

Mayor William Steinberg

He thinks the bylaw doesn't impose a religious practice or value, since no one is prevented from working on these days – they're just required to keep noise levels down. Steinberg added that electric and manual lawnmowers do not fall under the ban.

The Jewish holiday noise ban came to wide public notice this Rosh Hashanah, when Hampstead resident of 14 years, Fred Chano, complained to the media on the holiday's eve.

"I think the city has been taken over by religious extremists. It's a racist law," he told the televison station TVA. He vowed to defy the law and force a court challenge.

Steinberg said it's the first complaint about the bylaw.

"It is not related to any one religion, but to times and days when most residents want peace and tranquility, whether those days are secular or religious holidays… It is unfortunate that the Town of Hampstead is being accused of imposing the religious views of our majority on the minority when we are just being even-handed… Hampstead is a secular town which has not, does not and will never discriminate against any minority," he said at an Oct. 3 council meeting in his first official statement on the issue.

In a province that has still not resolved the bitter debate over reasonable accommodation of religious minorities, the story touched off some heated media commentary, which blogger David Ouellette, who works for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), describes as "a campaign of yellow journalism."

Inflammatory opinions, some clearly antisemitic, were aired on radio talk shows and on the Internet. Hampstead and Steinberg personally received a flood of communication from across Quebec, most of it disagreeing with the bylaw.

Constitutional lawyer Julius Grey commented that such a religious-based bylaw is contrary to the Quebec and Canadian human rights charters.

Cultural Communities Minister Kathleen Weil and Municipal Affairs Minister Laurent Lessard then questioned the legality of Hampstead's bylaw.

While deploring the "reckless rhetoric" in certain media and the hateful remarks by some people, Rabbi Reuben Poupko said he can't understand how Hampstead could enact such a bylaw, especially at a time when sentiments were still raw after a couple of years of acrimonious discussion over the place of religion in the public sphere.

"If my neighbour, whether Jewish or non-Jewish, is doing work around their house, it in no way affects my celebration of Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur. All governments should err on the side of personal freedom and keeping the public space secular."

At the same time, Rabbi Poupko, spiritual leader of Côte St. Luc's Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron, "vigorously denounce[d] the grotesque over-reaction" to the Hampstead's restriction on noise on Jewish holidays, saying it was aimed at "inflaming the public."

Ouellette, CIJA's associate director for Quebec public affairs, is particularly disturbed by the coverage by French-language TV broadcasters TVA and LCN, the Journal de Montréal and 98.5FM. Benoit Dutrizac, a host on that radio station, encouraged listeners to go to Hampstead on Rosh Hashanah and "blow their horn, make noise, fart, whatever, any noise to indicate to the Jewish community that it is not the Jewish community that leads Quebec."

Perfect season for roasted vegetables

Judy Bart Kancigor
Special to The CJN

You recycle your newspapers and plastic. You carry your groceries in reusable bags. But are you shopping locally and seasonally?

Strolling down the supermarket produce aisle, one would hardly know that seasons exist, with fruits and vegetables travelling to us from all over the world. But at the farmers markets where organic, sustainable produce is sold, you will find seasonal fruits and vegetables that haven't racked up those frequent flyer miles.

As Jews, we are bidden to tend to our planet, to protect God's creation. In caring for the environment we are engaging in tikkun olam, or healing the earth, a notion that has been central to Jewish teaching for thousands of years.

Sukkot, once an agricultural holiday of thanksgiving (later combined historically with the Israelites' 40-year desert journey during which they lived in "tabernacles" (or booths), is the perfect time to remind us of this duty. As we celebrate within the sukkah, decorated with the bounty of the season, we reflect on the source of our very sustenance and renew our commitment to heal the earth.

"Talking to organic farmers, I am struck that these are some of the brightest people I know and the most passionate about what they're doing," said Cathy Thomas, author of Melissa's Everyday Cooking with Organic Produce (Wiley).

"Organic soil is completely different," she noted. "I remember how the earth smelled when I was a little kid growing up in Van Nuys [in California]. My father enriched the soil, and I remember how things grew and how good they tasted. Why does organic produce cost more than its conventional counterparts? Harvesting is a time-consuming process, because organic crops have not been manipulated chemically and they therefore mature naturally, yielding smaller harvests. Widely grown organic produce, however, such as Fuji apples, carrots and lemons, may be more competitively priced.

But the big difference is in the taste.

"People always ask, 'Do they really taste better?'" Thomas said. "There is actually a standard that can be measured. Organic produce has a higher Brix level, a measure of its sugar. Organic plums, plumcots, strawberries or apricots measure higher in sugar and taste sweeter to balance their tartness. Organic strawberries are much smaller than conventionally grown strawberries and they're a lot more flavourful and higher in Brix."

An invaluable reference for purchasing and cooking with organic produce, Everyday Cooking offers more than 400 inspiring, mouth-watering recipes accompanied by veteran photographer Nick Koon's eye-catching full-colour photos. Thomas, food columnist with the Orange County Register and voted Best Food Columnist in the nation by the Association of Food Journalists, has teamed up with Melissa's World Variety Produce, the nation's leading distributor of specialty fruits and vegetables, to create a complete resource: shopping and storing tips, serving suggestions, complete nutritional information – and imaginative recipes: Chicken Saté with Peanut Sauce, Linguine with Baby Spinach and Blue Cheese, Cherry, Chocolate and Toasted Almond Ice Cream, Lime and Raspberry Cheesecake with White Chocolate, even a Kiwi Martini. You were expecting maybe just salads?

As the days grow shorter and the crispness of fall is in the air, I'm craving root vegetables, roasted to a honeyed sweetness.

"Roasted vegetables are downright scrumptious," Thomas advised. "It's an easy method that creates caramelization on the exterior with a beautiful browning that produces sweet flavours and masks any of a vegetable's subtle bitterness. And in fall and winter, roasting vegetables seems to make more sense than grilling. The warmth of the oven combined with the smell of those vegetables cooking is cold weather cozy."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

> "In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.
> The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.
> Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

ROASTED ROOT VEGETABLES

3 medium beets, unpeeled, with 1-in. stem attached
3 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
2 medium turnips, peeled, halved lengthwise, cut into 1/4-in. pieces
4 medium carrots, peeled, cut into 3/4-in. pieces
2 parsnips, peeled, cut into 3/4-in. pieces
1 large sweet potato, peeled, halved lengthwise, cut into 1/4-in. slices, light tan variety preferred
1 large yellow onion, cut into 1-in.-wide wedges
3 tbsp. honey
1 1/2 tbsp. fresh thyme leaves
2 medium cloves garlic, peeled, cut in half lengthwise
salt and freshly ground black pepper

Adjust oven rack to middle position. Preheat oven to 400. To bake beets, scrub beets and wrap (still wet) in heavy-duty aluminum foil. Bake in preheated oven until fork-tender, 45 to 60 minutes, depending on size. When cool enough to handle, slip off peel.

Place oil in large roasting pan; place in oven until oil is hot, about 4 minutes. Cautiously add all vegetables except beets and toss to coat. Roast 15 minutes. Add honey and thyme; toss to coat. Roast 60 to 65 minutes, or until vegetables are tender and nicely browned, tossing vegetables every 15 minutes.

Cut beets in half from top to bottom, cut them into 3/8-in. wedges and add to roasted vegetables. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Gently toss. Yield: 8 servings.

Israeli wins Nobel Prize in chemistry

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli scientist Daniel Shechtman has been named as the winner of the 2011 Nobel Prize in chemistry, the award panel for the prestigious prize announced last Wednesday. He was awarded the prize for his discovery of patterns in atoms called "quasicrystals," a chemical structure that researchers previously thought was impossible.

Tel Aviv-born Shechtman, 70, is a professor at Technion – Israel Institute of Technology, in Haifa, as well as an associate of the U.S. Department of Energy's Ames Laboratory, and a professor at Iowa State University.

The Nobel committee for chemistry at the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences said Shechtman had discovered quasicrystals, which it said were like "fascinating mosaics of the Arabic world reproduced at the level of atoms" and which never repeated themselves.

Up until then, scientists had thought the atom patterns inside crystals had to repeat themselves. The academy said Shechtman's discovery in 1982 fundamentally changed the way chemists look at solid matter.

Shechtman's discovery opened the door for experiments in the use of the quasicrystals in everything from diesel engines to frying pans.

"His discovery was extremely controversial. In the course of defending his findings, he was asked to leave his research group," said the committee. "However, his battle eventually forced scientists to reconsider their conception of the very nature of matter."

The prize of 10 million Swedish crowns (about $1.5 million Cdn) was the third of this year's Nobel prizes, following awards for medicine last Monday and for physics last Tuesday. Shechtman and the other Nobel Prize winners will receive their awards at a Dec. 10 ceremony in Stockholm.

Israel has an impressive showing when it comes to Nobel winners, with 10 laureates in its 63-year history. Most recently, Israeli scientist Ada Yonath of the Weizmann Institute won the same Nobel Prize for chemistry in 2009, for her work on the ribosome. Three Israeli politicians have also won the Nobel Prize for peace – Menachem Begin in 1978 and Shimon Peres and Yitzhak Rabin in 1994.

Shechtman won the Israel Prize in physics in 1998.

"The celebration is not just for the Technion or for Israel, but also for all of science," Shechtman said last Wednesday at a news conference. "There are thousands of scientists studying this subject... I believe that they see this prize as also their achievement."

Both Président Shimon Peres and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu spoke with Shechtman by phone to congratulate him on winning the prize.

"I want to congratulate you on behalf of the citizens of Israel for this praiseworthy win which expresses the intellect of our people," Netanyahu said.

Defence Minister Ehud Barak also congratulated Shechtman on his achievement, saying that the "groundbreaking research of Prof. Shechtman is a cause for celebration for the Technion, and Israel." Barak added that Shechtman's prize is "further evidence of the rare human resources that exist in Israel."

The Nobel Prize in physiology or medicine 2011 was awarded to Bruce Beutler and Jules Hoffmann for their discoveries concerning the activation of innate immunity and Ralph Steinman for his discovery of the dendritic cell and its role in adaptive immunity.

The Nobel Prize in physics was awarded to Saul Perlmutter, Brian Schmidt and Adam Riess for the discovery of the accelerating expansion of the universe through observations of distant supernovae.

The Nobel Prize in chemistry was warded to Dan Shechtman for the discovery of quasicrystals.

Steinman was the pride of Sherbrooke Jews

The Nobel committee was not aware of Steinman's death when it announced the three winners in medicine, and subsequently made the unprecedented decision to give him the prize posthumously.

The awards ceremony will take place Dec. 10 in Stockholm. Steinman's estate will share the $1.5-million with the other co-winners, American Bruce Beutler and Jules Hoffmann of France, who were cited for their shared research on the early stages of the immune response.

Steinman earned his bachelor of science degree with honours at McGill University in 1963. He lived with his maternal grandparents, Eva and Nathan Takefman.

He left the city to study medicine at Harvard University, graduating magna cum laude in 1968, and completed his internship and residency at Massachusetts General Hospital. At both McGill and Harvard, he earned scholarships.

He joined Rockefeller in 1970 as a post-doctoral fellow, working with the late Zanvil Cohn and James Hirsch.

Steinman maintained close family and professional ties with Montreal, and returned frequently over the years.

His older brother, Seymour Steinman, and his wife, Linda, who live in Montreal, described Ralph as "a terrific man and a great guy. He worked seven days a week on his research." There is another brother, Mark, and sister, Joni.

Over the years, Steinman had professional relationships with the Royal Victoria Hospital and the Montreal General Hospital, and their successor, the McGill University Health Centre.

Friend and colleague, Montreal cancer specialist Dr. Phil Gold, said Steinman's four-year survival with the usually rapidly lethal pancreatic cancer is exceptional. "It's beyond the norm... I would like to believe it was the dendritic cells that... allowed this to happen."

In 2003, Steinman was awarded the Gairdner Foundation International Award in Toronto in recognition of his pioneering work on dendritic cells. It was one of numerous recognitions.

His alma mater said Steinman's research transformed scientific understanding of the body's ability to fight invading micro-organisms.

"Dr. Steinman's outstanding work in immunology and his discovery of the key role dendritic cells play in immune processes has led to a number of significant potential therapies for a variety of diseases, including cancer," said McGill principal Heather Munroe-Blum, who extended her condolences to the family.

"Our delight at his many accomplishments is tempered by sadness at his most untimely loss."

Prime Minister Stephen Harper paid homage to Steinman, stating that the Nobel Prize is "a fitting final tribute to his life's work... Thanks to [the co-winners'] dedication, the boundaries of science and medicine have been expanded."

At his death, Steinman was the Henry G. Kunkel professor at Rockefeller University, a senior physician at Rockefeller University Hospital and head of the laboratory of cellular physiology and immunology.

Can the Labor party revive itself, and Israeli politics?

Linda Gradstein
JTA

KFAR SABA, Israel — The Israeli Labor party's new leader, Shelly Yachimovich, makes a grand entrance at the annual Rosh Hashanah toast for party activists.

Well over an hour after the guests begin munching on puff pastries, she is greeted like a conquering hero as she wades into the crowd wearing black jeans and sandals. Everyone wants to shake her hand, hug her, kiss her.

Yachimovich ascends the makeshift dais and waits as each of Labor's Knesset members makes a brief speech offering good wishes for the New Year. The speakers include former defence minister Amir Peretz, whom she edged for the party leadership in primaries last month.

In her remarks, Yachimovich concentrates on socio-economic issues – her signature focus and, analysts say, the reason she won the Labor primaries after a summer of socioeconomic discontent in Israel.

"What is Netanyahu's solution to the high cost of living?" she asks the enthusiastic crowd, referring to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. "To open the Israeli markets, to destroy Israeli industry, to cause thousands of workers to lose their jobs. Not in our party! Not in our party!"

The crowd applauds.

"We are the only ones on the political map who can present a real, deep, social democratic alternative to the capitalistic extremism that Netanyahu has championed," she says.

Yachimovich, 51, has been in the Knesset for six years. Before that she was a well-known journalist, first on Israel Radio and then on Channel 2. She also wrote two novels.

In contrast to most Israeli political leaders, who emphasize security issues, Yachimovich has focused on social justice causes. She initiated a law requiring employers to provide chairs for their cashiers, as well as legislation favouring Israeli factories and companies over foreign ones, and a law extending maternity leave to 14 weeks.

Shelly Yachimovich

Her reputation for social causes worked in her favour following a summer that saw hundreds of thousands of Israelis take to the streets for protests focusing on socioeconomic issues.

Yachimovich's candidacy succeeded in attracting thousands of young voters to Labor, which had become known in Israel as the "alte kackers party" – Yiddish for "old folks."

The election last month seems to have breathed new life into the Labor party, which had been Israel's dominant party for its first three decades, but has faltered greatly over the last 10 years.

In the 2009 elections, Labor suffered a crushing defeat, winning just 13 seats in the 120-seat Knesset and falling to number 4 in size among Israel's political parties. Another blow came earlier this year when Defence Minister Ehud Barak split off to form a new party called Atzmaut. He took four MKs with him.

Labor activists hope Yachimovich can unite the party and make it a renewed force in Israeli politics.

"Labor must rebuild itself with the goal of leading the social camp and the peace camp," former party leader Amram Mitzna told JTA. "These days, when 'peace' is a bad word, we have to rebuild hope. Only a combination of peace and social justice can create a new reality."

Yachimovich is only the second woman to lead Israel's Labor party. The first was prime minister Golda Meir. The Knesset's largest party, Kadima, is also led by a woman, Tzipi Livni, while another woman, Zahava Gal-On, is competing to lead the leftist Meretz Party.

"I think she did an excellent job as a parliamentarian," Labor party activist Eli Aloni said of Yachimovich. "She doesn't have enough experience in foreign policy, but she's a smart woman. She'll learn."

Media reports frequently describe Yachimovich as having a cold personality, and she has come under particular fire from a former colleague at Channel 2, Nehemia Shtrasler.

Despite being a former journalist, Yachimovich often rebuffs the press. She declined an interview with JTA, and Jerusalem Post political reporter Gil Hoffman said she cut off an interview with him after 90 seconds.

Labor still has a long way to go before it returns to its former glory. Recent surveys found that if elections were held today, Labor would win 22 seats in Israel's 120-seat Knesset, passing both Kadima and Yisrael Beitenu, but still trailing Likud.

Rabbis protest mosque vandalism

Nearly 1,000 rabbis in Israel and America have signed a petition condemning the burning two weeks ago of a mosque in a Bedouin town in northern Israel. According to the New Israel Fund, which circulated the petition within 24 hours of the Oct. 2 arson, it was presented last Thursday to the imam of the Tuba-Zangariya village, where the attack took place. Meanwhile, Israeli police arrested a man suspected of involvement in the incident. The suspect was arrested just hours after the attack. The haredi newspaper Yated Ne'eman condemned the torching. "Jews don't burn mosques, period," the newspaper's editorial said: "No shadow of justification can be found for harming a Muslim mosque. This is an insane, dangerous act," the newspaper wrote.

Israel Museum selling its art

The Israel Museum is selling 38 rare pieces of art estimated to be worth $17 million. The money earned from the auctions will go to update the Jerusalem museum's collection, the Israeli business daily Globes reported. Sotheby's will run the auctions beginning next month to include paintings by Magritte, Pissarro, Picasso and Chagall. The museum decided to sell off some of its artwork due to a reduction in donations and a need to purchase newly recognized important works of art, according to Globes. There are 500,000 objects and works of art in the Israel Museum's collection.

Joseph's tomb vandalized

Joseph's Tomb was vandalized with swastikas and other graffiti. Joseph's Tomb is a site considered holy to Jews. The biblical patriarch Joseph and his sons, Ephraim and Menashe, are believed to be buried there. Israeli soldiers discovered the damage early Thursday morning, shortly before more than 1,000 Jewish worshippers came to pray at the tomb located near Nablus in the West Bank. The pilgrimage ahead of Yom Kippur was co-ordinated in advance with the Israeli army. The soldiers covered the graffiti with white paint before the arrival of the worshippers, Ha'aretz reported.

Livni visits England

Israeli opposition leader Tzipi Livni made her first visit to Britain since a law that allows for the prosecution of foreign officials for alleged war crimes was amended. Livni arrived last Thursday in London; a request for an arrest warrant against Livni was turned down the same day, according to Ynet. She had cancelled a 2009 visit when a warrant for her arrest was issued over her role in the Gaza war. Livni was Israel's foreign minister during the month-long war in 2008-09. Under the new law, which took effect Sept. 15, Britain's director of public prosecutions must agree to issue an arrest warrant in universal jurisdiction cases in which the alleged crimes were committed outside of Britain. This means political considerations also will be taken into account. Livni met with British Foreign Secretary William Hague, reportedly at his invitation, and praised Britain for amending the law.

Canada returns 'Jewish Taliban' girls to Israel

Oz Rosenberg
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — In a precedent-setting move, a Jerusalem court is expected to decide this week whether it's legal for Israelis to belong to the extreme haredi sect Lev Tahor, a group known as "the Jewish Taliban" that's headquartered in a town north of Montreal.

A decision reached last week by a family court in Rishon Lezion indicated that a ruling on Lev Tahor's legality is imminent.

The decision followed what appears to be the end of an international family drama involving two sisters from Beit Shemesh who belong to the sect. Canadian authorities forcibly returned the pair to Israel on Oct. 2 under an order issued by the court. The sisters, 13 and 15, were en route to a Lev Tahor community in Sainte-Agathe-des-Monts, Que.

The brother of the sister's grandmother petitioned for the writ. The great-uncle was concerned the girls might be harmed living in the Canadian community.

Lev Tahor is a cult, he contended, and if the girls enter it, they would be stripped of their property and forced to wed male members of the cult, an accepted practice among all young women in the group.

The Israeli court upheld the petition, finding that "there is some defect in the parents' perception of ways of life."

Judge Rivka Makayes ruled that the writ will remain in effect until this week, when a family court in Jerusalem will decide whether the parents' pious lifestyle is marred by such a defect.

Lev Tahor is sometimes called the Jewish Taliban because female members are clad in head-to-toe black robes, with head scarves tied tightly under their necks, with only faces and hands visible.

The Jerusalem court's ruling will have implications for all members of the sect in Israel. If it finds that it's illegal to belong to Lev Tahor, social welfare agencies will be able to take immediate steps to remove children from the control of parents affiliated with it.

Bringing the sisters back to Israel was an international operation involving Israel's foreign ministry and Interpol.

Lev Tahor – which means "Pure Heart" – was established about a decade ago, and today has about 45 families, some of them newly Orthodox Israeli families.

The leader calls himself Rabbi Shlomo Elbarnes. From Jerusalem's Kiryat Yovel neighbourhood, this charismatic figure began forming extremist groups in the United States 20 years ago. His followers are said to heed his authority entirely.

A group of young women from the extreme haredi sect

He brought his followers to Canada after U.S. authorities expelled him due to charges he coercively asserted control over a 13-year-old minor. He settled group members in Sainte-Agathe-des-Monts, where they are said to be fervently religious, holding prayer services that last nearly the entire day.

Rituals reportedly involve lashing anyone considered a "sinner," and marrying off 14-year-old girls.

At dawn on Sept. 28, the parents of the Beit Shemesh girls put their daughters on a flight to Montreal, intending for them to join Lev Tahor after Rosh Hashanah.

"We checked the place thoroughly, and it seemed suitable," said the mother of the girls, who spoke Oct. 3 at Ben-Gurion International Airport.

But when the girls reached the airport in Canada, two Canadian officials detained them and said they wouldn't be able to enter the country.

"We reached the airport in Canada," the older of the two girls said. "We saw people from Lev Tahor waiting to take us to their community, but suddenly police officers came and took us aside."

"We tried to resist. We screamed and cried," one of the sisters said Oct. 3 after they were brought back to Israel. Due to Rosh Hashanah, they weren't immediately flown back to Israel. They were temporarily placed under the care of a family in a Canadian orphanage. On Oct. 2, they were put on a return flight, where they remained under the supervision of Canadian police.

When they reached Ben-Gurion International Airport, authorities there took them to meet a social worker from Beit Shemesh. The social worker phoned their parents, who had no knowledge of their daughters' return to Israel. The worker informed the parents they were being held at the airport.

According to the parents, the social workers said their daughters would only be permitted to return to them if the parents signed a form attesting they would not try to send the pair to the Lev Tahor community in Canada again.

Russian Jews see stability with Putin

Lev Krichevsky
JTA

Analysis

Was Vladimir Putin's carefully choreographed plan to return to Russia's presidency in 2012 a big blow to democracy or a victory for stability?

It all depends on whom you ask.

Most Russian Jews, it seems, say that Putin's return after a four-year stint as prime minister is good news for stability, and that's good for the country's Jewish community. Critics, however, say it's a sign of Russia's stagnation.

Echoing traditional Jewish sensibilities, Yevgeniy Satanovsky, head of the Institute for Israel and Near Eastern Studies, a think tank in Moscow, says that Jews do not have to worry about Putin.

"Putin is neither an antisemite nor anti-Israel," Satanovsky said.

For Russia's Jews, whose estimated numbers range from 500,000 to 1 million, Putin marked a departure from the antisemitism of past Communist elites and of the once all-powerful KGB, which he served for nearly two decades.

Putin was the first Russian leader to visit Israel, where he attended an official reception. He also visited a Moscow synagogue, participated in candlelighting ceremonies on Chanukah and reportedly had an open door for one of Russia's two chief rabbis, Berel Lazar.

While human rights groups reported surges in xenophobic attacks at various times during Putin's presidency, Jews rarely were the targets.

Lazar said Putin should be credited for driving antisemitism out of Russian political discourse.

Politicians in today's Russia "would not risk taking an antisemitic or a so-called anti-Zionist stand," Lazar said. "Any impartial observer should acknowledge Putin's big role in this."

As president and prime minister, Lazar said, Putin "paid great attention to the needs of our community and related to us with a deep respect."

But the Putin regime also earned a reputation for intimidating political opponents and journalists, and rolling back democratic reforms. As evidence, critics say one need look no further than the way he has orchestrated his return to power.

Vladimir Putin

The announcement about the next stage of Putin's rule over Russia came Sept. 24, when Russian President Dmitry Medvedev, Putin's handpicked successor to the post, said he would not run in next year's presidential election. Medvedev then backed Putin's return to the Kremlin. In return, Putin offered Medvedev the prime minister's chair in 2012.

Putin, the president from 2000 to 2008, was constitutionally barred from seeking a third consecutive four-year term. The 2008 arrangement that made Putin the prime minister for four years was widely seen as a sign that Putin would retain control over the reins of power, and his intention to return to the presidency confirms that thinking. With presidential terms extended to six years by Medvedev – presumably with Putin in mind – Putin, who turns 59 this week, could serve as Russia's president until 2024.

His public approval rating is high and he isn't expected to meet any formidable political challenges.

Putin's popularity is explained largely by the Russians' yearning for order and a strong hand skilfully wielded by the Kremlin's political advisers. Over the years of his rule, Putin effectively sidetracked any real opposition, put the brakes on political dissent on national airwaves and turned Russia's parliament – dominated by his United Russia party – into a virtual arm of his regime.

Liberals find his plan to return to the presidency deeply disturbing.

"I'm honestly shaken by the impudence with which this was all done," Yevgeniya Albats, a prominent Russian Jewish journalist, told Echo Moskvy radio, one of Russia's few remaining liberal media outlets.

"We have witnessed how all institutions of the Russian Federation were torn down – the constitution, the elections," said Albats, the editor in chief of the New Times weekly magazine in Moscow.

Critics blame Putin for dismantling many of the democratic achievements of his predecessor, Boris Yeltsin, for failing to implement many substantial economic and social reforms, for nurturing widespread corruption and for creating a system in which only those with ties to his clan can prosper.

Others argue that Putin's return, no matter how it was orchestrated, is a fair reflection of realities in today's Russia.

"It may not be happening all nicely, but democracy is not built overnight," Satanovsky said. "Putin is coming back to power as a real leader of a large political and economic clan. Can it change soon? I don't see how."

The early years of Putin's presidency were marked by Kremlin pressure against Russia's oligarchs – the once politically influential Russian business tycoons, many of whom were Jews. But in recent years, most leading business figures in Russia have withdrawn from political life, marking a victory for the Kremlin.

Despite the fact that many of those oligarchs were Jewish, Satanovsky notes that Putin never let his political, business and even personal battles "translate into anything anti-Jewish."

While the Putin era has not been good for democracy in Russia, Jewish life in the country has continued to thrive. Thousands of parents send their children to Jewish schools and camps, and new synagogues and community centres are being added every year. There are even new museums opening in Moscow.

Despite these gains under Putin and his loyal successor Medvedev, a sense of unease left over from the olden days persists among many Jewish community leaders, who declined to speak on the record with JTA about the perils of Putin's cavalier approach toward democracy.

"There is a certain frustration in the society," said one Jewish leader who asked that his name not be used. "But the revolution is nowhere near. There is no democracy, and life goes on."

Syria threatens to strike Israel

Shlomo Shamir and Natasha Mozgovaya
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Syria will strike Israel and "set fire" to the Middle East if foreign forces choose to launch a military strike on the protest-ridden country, Syrian President Bashar Assad said last week.

During a meeting with Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu, Assad was quoted by the Iranian semi-official news agency Fars as saying that Syria would not hesitate to strike major Israeli cities if it was attacked.

"If a crazy measure is taken against Damascus, I will need not more than six hours to transfer hundreds of rockets and missiles to the Golan Heights to fire them at Tel Aviv," Assad said.

In addition, Fars reported that the Syrian president told the Turkish foreign minister that he would also call on Hezbollah in Lebanon to launch a rocket attack on Israel, adding: "All these events will happen in three hours, but in the second three hours, Iran will attack the U.S. warships in the Persian Gulf and the U.S. and European interests will be targeted simultaneously."

The move heralds a further deterioration in previously friendly relations between Ankara and Damascus since the start of Assad's crackdown on protesters.

In related news, Russia and China thwarted a UN Security Council proposal to condemn Syria and to mount pressure on Assad's regime with economic sanctions.

Nine Security Council members, including the United States, United Kingdom and France, voted for the proposal, while four members abstained.

The proposal put forward by the French delegation had been circulating among the delegations in the past month. Lately, it had been reported that the proposal had been softened, and the proposal voted on Tuesday did not include any sanctions, but rather included warnings that sanctions would be put forward if the Assad regime continued oppressing its protesting citizens.

Despite this, Russia and China opposed the proposal, and due to their veto power had the proposal suppressed.

According to a report recently published by the United Nations, 2,700 Syrian citizens have been killed by Syrian security forces during the suppression of protests that have engulfed the country in recent months.

The U.S. representative to the UN, Susan E. Rice, said, following the vote: "[Syria] is on the wrong side of history. It is not going to get what it seeks by the continual repression and killing and imprisoning of its people. It doesn't work and it won't succeed, and sooner or later that will be self-evident."

Rice said Washington was outraged and that it was time for the Security Council to adopt "tough, targeted sanctions" on Syria.

The Syrian economy is reeling from U.S. and European Union sanctions on the small but key oil sector, which is linked to the Assad family and ruling elites.

Time is right for economic soul-searching

Sami Peretz
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

Israel comes to Yom Kippur 5772 after four highly unusual months during which a somnolent majority woke up and began to loudly protest its lot. And this happened just as the global economy began to head – it can now be said with some certainty – into another recession.

The ripples from the crises shaking Europe and the United States will inevitably reach Israel in the near future. In the shadow of this black cloud spreading toward us in Israel from the West, our economic leaders need to correctly identify the worst of the global threats and devise ways of deflecting them. But no less importantly, they need to identify the worst of the threats right here at home. They need to identify what Israelis need most, and they need to think of solutions.

The worst thing they could do now is hunker down in a mental bunker and pour cold water over reforms, on the ostensible grounds that this isn't a good time. This is the perfect time to do some soul-searching with respect to some of the burning issues of the day.

The Trajtenberg report

One might think that everything that can be said about the Trajtenberg report on socioeconomic change, a study of what the state could do to better the lot of the people, has already been said – that the committee has nothing concrete to offer, that it proposes too much. That it's too broad and whole sections of the committee's recommendations should be scrapped, and that whole areas have been neglected and must be added.

One could continue picking at the report for many moons or bury it at midnight, leaving no trace.

Or one could look at the report, which was prepared at light speed, as the first payment – and not the last – to the grassroots protest movement that erupted four months ago. One could realize that the report is the starting point for great processes that will change national priorities, strengthen the weakest members of society, the middle class and the business sector.

A coalition has been forming in opposition to the Trajtenberg report. It includes politicians, business monopolies and other powerful sectors such as the Histadrut labour federation and even the protest leaders themselves, who feel it didn't address their issues. If this coalition is allowed to bury the report, it will be a hideous loss of opportunity.

The medical residents

It's challenging to empathize with the medical residents who oppose the deal over pay and conditions signed last month between their union and the Finance Ministry, as they struggle on, prepared to pay the personal price of losing their jobs rather than compromise on their principles. It's true that doctors have plenty of employment opportunities around the world, but it's a personal price of a magnitude that Israelis haven't seen before in the various labour battles that take place here day in and day out.

But they are causing tremendous damage on the way, both to Israel's health-care system and to the cause of labour relations. With all due sympathy for their woes, capitulating to their demands – after the union representing them, the Israel Medical Association, signed a nine-year agreement with the Finance Ministry – would destroy the fibre of labour relations and collective employment agreements in Israel. The doctors don't like the agreement but that's the agreement that was reached.

It is therefore little surprise that the loudest opponent to capitulation is none other than Histadrut chair Ofer Eini.

Eini understands well that if the Finance Ministry gives up and quails before the residents, it will render all other collective employment agreements between government and unions meaningless. Eini knows that letting the residents prevail over the Finance Ministry would trigger a wave of demands by sectors and sub-sectors of workers unsatisfied with the achievements the unions representing them have delivered.

The Finance Ministry is worried, with good reason, that capitulating to the residents would create anarchy.

Ofer Eini

Ofer Eini, union chief

As for Ofer Eini, the erosion of his status began when the Labor party stalked out of the coalition and then split into two factions. The erosion of his status continued when the social grassroots protest began to rise – and had nothing to do with the Histadrut. Now his status is being tested again, thanks to the medical residents. It is, therefore, no shock that at this time and under these circumstances, Eini has chosen to declare a labour dispute. His cause du jour: ending the practice by both government and business of using temporary workers.

Undoubtedly, the use of temporary workers hired through manpower agencies has created distortions. Manpower companies retain too much of the money paid for their services and give the workers too small a share. Something definitely needs to be done about improving their lot.

But if the subject at stake is the accounting of the soul ahead of the Day of Atonement, perhaps one should ask Eini and the Histadrut how this downtrodden, lowly subsect of temps arose?

The Histadrut and powerful unions in Israel bear much responsibility for all this problem. For years, the Histadrut and the unions let big businesses and the government form this subclass in the labour market. Why? That's how they stymied cutbacks that could harm tenured workers, living the life of Riley in the embrace of their cushy collective employment agreements.

That was the deal that the Histadrut and the powerful unions concocted with big business, a deal relying on perks aplenty for tenured workers, including raises during recessions, and absolute protection from dismissal. But somebody has go to when an axe is waving around and efficiency measures are called for: thus the subclass of temps was created and perpetuated.

Eini may beat his breast and act to better the lot of the unhappy temps, first and second generation, but let him have no illusions: the only way to do it is to bring more flexibility and rationality into collective employment agreements, which sometimes seem like figments from la-la land, not serious contracts.

The banks

After years of complaining about their fees, banks have had a break in the last few months, mainly because the public's outrage found other targets – housing prices, the cost of living, cottage cheese and so on.

Meanwhile, around the world, banks have been in a state of uproar that began when Lehman Bros. imploded three years ago, forcing governments to inject hundreds of billions of dollars into the banks to shore them up.

One outcome of the crisis was that the banks scaled back lending, reducing the oxygen needed for economic growth.

Over here, our banks never reached such dire straits. But now they have to strengthen their capital base, the Bank of Israel says, like their peers overseas.

Horror scenarios immediately began to float – about a credit crunch and so on.

The bottom line is that the actions the Bank of Israel has taken so far have helped Israel's banks skip above the global hurricane. The process of strengthening their capital base could have casualties. Shareholders will have to settle for more modest dividends, and big business borrowers may have to lower their leverage. But who will benefit?

Just about everybody. Banks will be stronger, bankers will have less risk to contend with, and smaller borrowers will become more desirable as far as the banks are concerned, because the banks will prefer to diversify their lending among greater numbers of smaller borrowers, not lend the lion's share to a small group of enormous borrowers, with all the risk that entails.

Family from Cairo experiences culture shock in America

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

In The Man in the White Sharkskin Suit, Lucette Lagnado chronicled her Jewish family's exodus from Cairo after the Suez Canal crisis and the rise of anti-semitism in Nasser's Egypt.

In that book, which won her the Sami Rohr Prize for Jewish Literature in 2008, the author, a journalist with the Wall Street Journal, focused her narrative on Leon, her father, the title figure of the book, a proud, prosperous businessman. He wore the sharpest of suits, dated the prettiest of women and socialized with the ruling British officers.

Although he was determined to remain in Cairo as long as he could, the rising hostility toward Jews in Egypt in the 1950s forced him to take his wife, Edith, and their four children out of Egypt to America, where they settled in an immigrant community in Brooklyn.

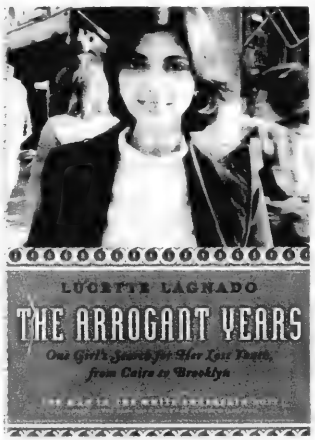
Now, in The Arrogant Years, One Girl's Search for Her Lost Youth from Cairo to Brooklyn (Ecco), Lagnado revisits her family's story, but this time Leon remains in the background, a lost, broken man selling ties on the streets, while her mother, Edith, stands out as the protagonist of this memoir.

Although, especially in the middle of this book, Lagnado focuses on herself, her school years and her debilitating illness, her mother still remains at the forefront, literally holding her daughter's hands.

Lagnado's memoir is a beautiful patch quilt of memorable characters. We meet the aristocrat Madame Alice Suarez Cattaui, the wife of the pasha and chief lady-in-waiting to the royal family in 1930s Egypt. A Jewish woman who when not having high tea with foreign dignitaries was visiting Jewish schools and bringing clothes and supplies for needy children. She could consort with a king as with a child in need of a pair of sandals.

We meet the author's maternal grandmother, Alexandra, who after her husband abandoned her when the author's mother was a little girl, would swallow her pride and collect money from relatives.

The author paints an idyllic scene of 1930s Cairo where Jews lived a quiet, peaceful life. Jews lived with Muslims and Copts in vibrant neighbourhoods, speaking French or a mixture of Arabic and French favoured in the culture that was both European and Middle Eastern. Jews in Egypt were enjoying unprecedented freedoms and opportunities in the Muslim country.



In such a scene, we see Edith, the author's mother, now a slender, attractive young teacher going out for evening walks with her mother. They would catch the 9 p.m. double feature and afterward wander about the neighbourhood that was still alive and awake late into the summer evenings. Edith loved reading books, and her claim to fame was having read all of Proust's A La Recherché du Temps Perdu at age 15.

At 17, Edith became a teacher at a private school, sponsored by the charitable pasha's wife. Here, she became the unlikely protégé of this powerful woman who allowed her access to her husband's private library of thousands upon thousands of books – even giving her the key to this library.

"She was no longer simply a girl from an alleyway, but the fine and talented Mademoiselle Matalon, beloved by a pasha's wife, embraced by one of the most powerful women of Cairo." Edith married Leon, "un vrai aristocrate," her mother exclaimed proudly, when she was 20. He was 42.

But things didn't remain happy for long. The 1952 military coup deposed the king, and a period of instability began both for Egypt's Jewish community and specifically for Edith, who began to show signs of stress and depression. Her children would often witness her working herself into a frenzy, screaming and pulling her hair. She even threatened suicide.

The family finally emigrated in 1963, when Lucette, the author, was seven. It was a difficult period for the family, suffering from culture shock and a decline in their social standing.

Lagnado grew up as an outsider. Striving to be like the character Emma Peel of TV series The Avengers, she once came up with the idea of inching her chair week by week slowly at the back of the synagogue across the barrier that separated the women from the men. She hoped that by this gradual movement she would fit unnoticed into the men's section. It almost worked.

Her mother, meanwhile, continued to struggle, watching helplessly as her family assimilated and disintegrated.

She was committed to fasting. No fast was too trivial. She fasted on the Feast of Gedalia, on the Eve of Purim, on the 10th day of the 10th month and the 17th day of the fourth month. She fasted when the kids were sick and when she had a bad dream – or if the kids had a bad dream.

"Edith remained at heart the poor girl from Sakakini who went hungry when her mom couldn't put dinner on the table, except that now she chose to go hungry."

One of her few flirtations with happiness was when she took a job as a clerk at a library and allowed herself to imagine she was back at the pasha's library in Cairo.

Lagnado offers only brief glimpses into her own life. She always felt she was an outsider and had trouble making friends. She didn't fit in with the current culture – 1960s America – nor did she fit in with the image of the idealized young girl of her mother's imagination.

In her first year at university, her self-esteem was low, stemming from her weight loss due to treatment for Hodgkin's disease, as well as her concerns about her social status compared to the rich Jewish girls with their gold Hamsas and fashionable clothes.

Lagnado then speeds forward from the mid-1970s to the late '80s and her mother's slow decline due to Alzheimer's.

The author paints a terrible picture of her mother at the Jewish Home and Hospital being woken at six and then left alone on a wheelchair in the hallway until breakfast was served hours later.

She rapidly deteriorated. One day, she stood up from her wheelchair and stared yelling about "La Clef"... the key to the pasha's library from her youth.

The Arrogant Years is just as wonderful as its award-winning predecessor, although I find the author, perhaps intentionally, divulges little of herself. The ending feels rushed, and the reader is left wondering how the author went from an angry, sick young woman in her freshman year at Vassar College to a married and successful reporter for the Wall Street Journal. Perhaps – hopefully – that will be the focus of the third part of her memoir.

Filmmaker focuses on religious differences in families

Richard Stark at TIFF

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

When he was just 11, Richard Stark used to carry around his family's clunky VHS camera, asking his friends and family to be actors in his movies, dreaming that one day he would be a filmmaker.

Today, the 35-year-old is an emerging filmmaker and has worked with Grammy Award-winning artists, written award-winning documentaries and, most recently, wrote a short film that premièred at the Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF).

"As a kid, I always imagined that one day I might have a film première at the Toronto International Film Festival. I loved that the whole city was transformed during the film festival, and it's such an honour to have my film in this prestigious festival," said Stark.

The 13-minute film is called Afternoon Tea and is the story of a young boy who knocks on a stranger's door, a devout Sikh man, asking to use his phone to call his parents. The boy asks the man questions about his faith, beliefs and the symbolism behind wearing a turban. As the man gets more and more agitated, and the questions get more and more personal, it's finally revealed that this boy is his grandson, the product of his daughter marrying outside the faith, which is why the elderly man disowned her and pretends she is dead. The film ends with his long-lost daughter coming to take her son away and the grandfather visibly in pain from being unable to accept his family for the choices they made.

"I've seen families being torn apart from religious differences and the pain it causes both sides. Losing loved ones because of traditions and beliefs is such a universal story, and I wanted to humanize that story and let the audience decide what's right," said Stark.

Stark, grew up in Toronto and attended Denlow Elementary School and Hebrew school at Temple Emanu-El. By the time he finished high school, he had made 30 short films. Despite his passion for filmmaking, Stark decided to pursue a "safer" career path, receiving his undergraduate degree in biology from the University of Toronto. After four years of study, Stark knew that he would only be happy if he made movies. He moved to Los Angeles and earned his master's degree in fine arts from the University of Southern California film school.

Stark is ecstatic that his film was recognized in Toronto, the place where his passion for storytelling began. "My 85-year-old grandmother made me promise that she would see my name on the big screen in her lifetime. Having the world première in Toronto gives me the chance to make that dream come true," said Stark.

Stark hopes his film will help families who have been affected by religious differences understand each other better. "I hope my stories can touch people and give them a chance to reflect on their own life. It was so gratifying to have so many people come up to me after the première and say they experienced something similar, and I hope it gave them perspective."

CIRCUMCISE ME! IS THE STORY OF A TRIPLE CONVERSION

Christopher Campbell, the son of an ex-nun and a Catholic schoolteacher, began an intriguing spiritual journey after a misspent youth as a drug-drenched teenager in Philadelphia. After growing up Catholic, he converted to Judaism not once but three times, becoming first Reform, then Conservative, then Orthodox. Each conversion meant a circumcision.

Now known as Yisrael Campbell, he also studied theatre in New York and began performing standup comedy to tell his story of recovery and discovery. He soon brings his funny and moving story, Circumcise Me!, to Toronto courtesy of the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company.

Directed by Sam Gold, Circumcise Me! runs Oct. 25 to Nov. 6 at the Jane Mallett Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts, 27 Front St. E. Tickets $35.50 to $65.50. 416-366-7723, www.stlc.com.

Spanning from the 15th to the 20th century, the paintings include works on mainly classical and biblical themes by Jan Victors, Artus Wolfort, Luca Giordano, Antoine Coypel, Jean-Baptiste Jouvenet and Thomas Lawrence. The sculptural works include Gian Lorenzo Bernini's late Renaissance masterwork of Pope Gregory XV.

Joey Tanenbaum said his passion for collecting art began with an encounter with Auguste Rodin's Adam at the AGO when he was eight years old. Now he's thrilled to have given many valuable pieces of art to the AGO. "Knowing that these unique works of art will give pleasure to generations of Canadians justifies our decision to give back to our beloved country a token of our appreciation for the freedom Canada has given to all who have arrived here as immigrants," he said, noting that his grandparents came here from Poland in 1911 with only eight dollars in their pockets.

Names In the News: Israeli actress Ayelet Zurer portrays Superman's Kryptonian mother in Man of Steel, the Superman movie sequel currently being filmed. Zurer has previously starred in Angels & Demons and Munich. She is playing opposite Russell Crowe as Superman's Kryptonian father, Jor-El. British actor Henry Cavill, who appeared in the TV series The Tudors, has been cast as Superman. The movie is due in theatres in 2013.

Arts in Brief

• Yin and Yang, an exhibition of new works by May Karp, is on view at IX Gallery, 9 Davies Ave., Oct. 13 to Nov. 12.

• The Koffler Chamber Orchestra performs a concert inspired by the upcoming AGO show, Chagall and the Russian Avant-Garde. "Chagall's Musical World" features the music of the painter's favourite composers, Mozart and Tchaikovsky, as well as Alfred Schnittke and Marc Kopytman, composers who share Chagall's Russian-Jewish background. AGO Walker Court, Sunday, Nov. 20, 3 p.m. Free with admission.

• Man Booker nominated authors Patrick deWitt, Yvette Edwards, Esi Edugyan, Stephen Kelman and Alison Pick are only a few of the writers at this year's International Festival of Authors at Harbourfront Centre, Oct. 19 to 30. A special theme of Russian-Jewish writers, co-hosted by the Koffler Centre, involves Gál Beckerman, David Bezmozgis, Irwin Cotler, Peter Filkins and Michal Govrin. New literary lights include non-fiction scribe Joshua Knelman and Emma Ruby-Sachs, lawyer and author of the novel The Water Man's Daughter (and herself the daughter of lawyer Clayton Ruby). www.readings.org

Writer brings 'nerd and neuroses' to comedy troupe

David Silverberg
Special to The CJN

Everything is happening at once for Evany Rosen.

Her comedy troupe Picnicface debuted a TV series on the Comedy Network, they completed an indie film and will have a book in stores later this month.

When the 23-year-old Toronto native was being interviewed for this article, she was walking through a Vancouver hotel in between stints at the Vancouver International Improv Festival.

Rosen is busy, to put it mildly.

Picnicface, performing weekly shows in Halifax since 2005, has thrust Rosen into the comedic spotlight thanks to a Comedy Network series airing Wednesday nights. The sketches are a mix of wacky humour and poignant observations on all kinds of relationships. The eight-person cast show off each of their strengths, from slapstick comedy to, well, what's Rosen best asset?

"I've been called the brainiest writer," she says. She thinks she brings the "nerd and neuroses" to Picnicface, often enjoying a good word-play joke or sci-fi reference. "We all play radical versions of ourselves, and the stuff I ended up writing for me was the neurotic, eager to please, buried in her head."

Then we shouldn't be surprised to learn Woody Allen is one of Rosen's artistic inspirations. But she's not far from comedic royalty: Mark McKinney of the Kids in the Hall helped produce the Picnicface TV show.

Rosen also credits the network for letting the troupe include some risqué material, although the bosses knew where to draw the line. "A school shooting sketch obviously didn't make it in," Rosen recalls, "but that's just us doing our dark absurd comedy. Sometimes we go too dark."

Rosen, and the rest of Picnicface, recently completed the film Roller Town, which debuted in September at the Atlantic Film Festival. Far from a conventional film, it tells the story of "disco and its potential destruction in a community," says Rosen. To make things even stranger, all actors have to be on roller skates. "Yep, I got lots of bruises and even a concussion," she says, adding the film is being submitted to festivals across the world.

Then there's the book published by HarperCollins. Picnicface's Canada will be available in late October and takes a tongue-in-cheek look at Canadian culture. Topics to be explored include "the guide to upholding Canadian modesty" and "famous Canadian wizards." Picture a mix of Monty Python with Jon Stewart's book America.

Involved in film, comedy and the written word? Sounds like an ideal Jewish daughter, and Rosen admits a Jewish artistic spirit runs through her. Her grandmother was a jazz singer in New York, so Rosen can feel that Borscht Belt comedy blood influenced her. "And Jews have always been outsiders, so I often approach my comedy from an outsider looking in."

Next for Rosen is a waiting game, as both the film and TV series try to win more attention. She's hoping the Comedy Network renews the show for another season. The live shows are on hiatus because not all troupe members are in the same city at once.

If she were itching to try something else, to stretch her creative muscle, what would it be? "I'd love to write a feature film," she says. "I got a few ideas in the burner, but nothing I'm going to say just yet."

Voice actor successful in his unusual career

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

For decades, John Stocker has been breathing life into some of Canada's most beloved cartoons.

Known for roles in shows such as The Care Bears, Tin Tin and Babar, he now spends most of his time working as a voice director, joining voice actors in the studio and helping them get their characters just right.

"Maybe I would say it's sounding too real, or it's sounding too cartoony," says Stocker, 64, giving some examples of his feedback. 'Let's make him more nasal, pitch him up higher, give him a speech impediment of some sort or a little habit like a stutter, a stumble, a squeak.'"

His years of experience as an actor make him stand out from other voice directors, says Cory Doran, who is best-known as the title character on the animated series Jimmy Two-Shoes, and is working with Stocker on a new cartoon called Redakai.

"He knows how to relate to actors and what to say to get better performances out of them," Doran says. "He knows what to say to get people to figure it out."

Stocker began his career in his hometown of Toronto as a live action actor, but in his early 20s, he found himself in the world of voice acting. His agent recommended him for a voice role in a commercial, and from there, he had what he calls a "stereotypical meteoric rise." He had discovered a talent, and landed many roles quickly.

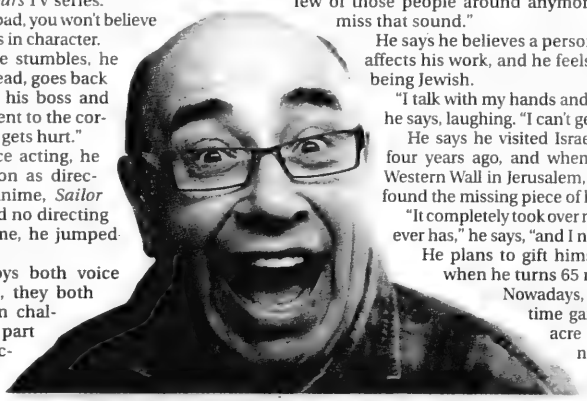
In Stocker's extensive resume, the role he likes best is Beastly, the bumbling sidekick to the main villain, No-Heart, in The Care Bears TV series.

"I'm going to be so bad, you won't believe how bad I am!" he says in character.

Then he adds, "He stumbles, he falls, he whacks his head, goes back and takes crap from his boss and apologizes and gets sent to the corner, and nobody ever gets hurt."

After years of voice acting, he was offered a position as director of the popular anime, Sailor Moon. Though he had no directing experience at the time, he jumped right in.

Although he enjoys both voice acting and directing, they both come with their own challenges. The hardest part of being a voice director, he says, is dealing with actors who aren't punctual and don't do their homework.



John Stocker

"I always say, 'You're coming in, you're going to make almost $1,000 to come in and read these 20 or 25 lines. Print your script, know your script, and come in prepared.'"

Being an actor brings different challenges, particularly the enormous competition. There are only about eight voice directors in the Toronto area, compared with around 15,000 voice performers, he says.

He's seen the business go through many changes over the years, including watching younger actors take centre stage.

"[It] has become a very young person's milieu," he says. "Voice directing has become one of those disciplines where the greying in the temples, or in my case, the balding of the head, has been a plus."

He remembers one time when a producer said they wanted an older actor to play a character – then clarified "older" as around 35 years old.

Everything has been down-aged, he says, including the casting of children.

"When they want a nine-year-old kid, they get a nine-year-old kid," he says, comparing it to the past, when women would play both young boys and young girls.

He brings his Jewish upbringing to some of his roles, as in his character Zaidy Saul in Jacob Two-Two, a cartoon based on the children's series by Mordecai Richler.

When he was a child, he attended an Orthodox synagogue where he heard the eastern European accents of that generation.

"To me, it was like wearing an old sweater that you love," he says of attending synagogue. "There are very few of those people around anymore, and I miss it. I miss that sound."

He says he believes a person's heritage always affects his work, and he feels very comfortable being Jewish.

"I talk with my hands and I speak with a lilt," he says, laughing. "I can't get away from it."

He says he visited Israel for the first time four years ago, and when he arrived at the Western Wall in Jerusalem, he felt as if he had found the missing piece of his DNA.

"It completely took over me, like nothing else ever has," he says, "and I need to go back."

He plans to gift himself a second visit when he turns 65 next year.

Nowadays, he spends his free time gardening on his 18-acre property in the north end of Whitby, Ont., in an area that he describes as "the diaspora of the diaspora."

He recognizes that he's found an unusual amount of success in the voice acting industry, and has been able to carve out a good life from an atypical career.

"I'm not a wealthy guy, but I've got enough," he says. "I'm a happy man."

L.A Times corrects 'Palestinian' Ben-Hur

Charlton Heston in Ben-Hur

JTA

The Los Angeles Times has corrected an item about an anniversary release of a Ben-Hur DVD that called the title character a Palestinian.

The correction came following complaints from readers and the staff of CAMERA: Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America about a calendar item published last month.

"A Sept. 26 calendar section article about a new DVD and Blu-ray release of the 1959 film Ben-Hur described the title character, played by Charlton Heston, as a Palestinian nobleman," the correction said. "The character Ben-Hur was a Jew from Judea who lived long before the place now known as Palestine was given that name."

The original item had said, "Based on the novel by Lew Wallace, the period drama revolves around Judah Ben-Hur (Heston), a Palestinian nobleman who is enslaved by the Romans, engages in one of the most thrilling chariot races ever captured on screen, and even encounters Jesus Christ."

Playwright did extensive research on Janusz Korczak

Laura Fixman
Special to The CJN

Hannah Moscovitch, 33, had a hard time writing her most recent play, The Children's Republic, because she wanted to create an accurate portrayal of the Righteous Gentile Dr. Janusz Korczak, but not a biography.

"I spent a long time thinking about whether you need to be inaccurate to arise at the authentic," Moscovitch said.

Korczak, in 1942, was in the Warsaw Ghetto with nearly 200 Jewish children from the orphanage he ran. He refused the offers of rescue he received from his Polish friends and accompanied the children to the Treblinka concentration camp, where he died.

Although the children in the play are fictional, Moscovitch said she had to do extensive research on Korczak's life to feel she was doing his story justice. She read three biographies of Korczak, the children's books he wrote and his diaries from the Warsaw Ghetto.

Hannah Moscovitch

She said that she doesn't see The Children's Republic as a Holocaust play, even though half of it takes place during that time period. Rather, it's more of an education story.

"I really admired his [Korczak's] philosophies and his spirit of reform," said Moscovitch, a playwright-in-residence at the Tarragon Theatre in Toronto.

"The Children's Republic spoke to what he was trying to do, and I'm trying to honour his pedagogical philosophy."

Before writing each line she had to do a level of research that she hadn't anticipated, she said. She had to think about how children in the 1930s would speak, particularly since the play is set in Poland. Since Korczak was a doctor, she also had to make sure his lines reflected medical knowledge of the time.

"It was dealing with a person who lived, and I was trying to be respectful to that," Moscovitch said. "I was trying to give an expression of who this man was."

The play begins in Korczak's orphanage, and it continues with him following the children to the Warsaw Ghetto. Moscovitch said working with the 13- and 14-year-old young actors in the play was among the most difficult aspects for her and also one of the most appealing.

"We never see children on stage, and I'm totally amazed by them," Moscovitch said.

"They have moments where they run around like kids, but they make intelligent comments, and we end up treating them absolutely no different than any other professionals."

Moscovitch said that writing about Jewish heroes felt terrifyingly risky, adding that The Children's Republic is a totally different style of play for her. "Having previous successes [East of Berlin, Essay and The Russian Play], it does something strange to you. It makes it more possible to take risks."

Korczak was a signatory to the League of Nations Declaration of the Rights of a Child, and Moscovitch said that the Warsaw Ghetto would be an extreme environment that would test his convictions. Moscovitch said that while she was writing, she knew the Holocaust would define the play.

"It's such an extreme event that any play with elements of the Holocaust is going to be defined that way," Moscovitch said.

"But this is an education story, and I think this is the biggest tribute to Korczak and to education.

Tarragon Theatre is producing the The Children's Republic with the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company. David Eisner, co-artistic director of Harold Green, said that it's been a wonderful partnership and the two theatres work together like a well-oiled machine.

The Children's Republic is a "really intriguing piece of work, and it's an important story in Jewish history," Eisner said. "It's an intrinsically Jewish piece, but it's also a more important piece for everyone to see."

The Children's Republic runs from Nov. 8 to Dec. 18 at the Tarragon Theatre, 30 Bridgman Ave. Toronto. www.tarragontheatre.com.

Cammalleri leads Habs to Winnipeg as Jets make debut

Harvey Rosen
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Sunday April 28, 1996: I remember it well.

It was a not-so-sweet 16 years ago when a capacity crowd of distraught and teary-eyed fans bid a fond adieu to an earlier version of the Winnipeg Jets, hoping – nay, praying – that one day they would return home where they rightfully belonged.

Return they have, and on opening night, Oct. 9, the legendary Montreal Canadiens were in town to face off against the new-look Jets in a game that was televised nationally on Hockey Night in Canada.

An important contributor to the Habs' success is Mike Cammalleri, a 29-year-old left-winger who plays bigger than his size at five-foot-nine and 182 pounds.

A second round choice of the Los Angeles Kings in the 2001 NHL entry draft, Cammalleri caught everyone's attention in 2004-05 when, playing with Manchester Monarchs, he captured the American Hockey League scoring title with 46 goals and 63 assists.

The son of a Jewish mother (Adele Gelbard) and an Italian father, the nifty sniper played three seasons with the Kings and one with the Calgary Flames, where in 2008-09 he recorded a career-high 39 goals and 43 assists.

Free agency followed. Cammalleri, who hails from Richmond Hill, Ont., signed in Montreal, where he managed in the first year of a five-year contract to record 26 goals and 24 assists in only 65 games. Last season he scored but 19 goals and 28 assists in 67 games.

What Cammalleri lacks in stature he makes up for with strength. His personal off-season trainer, Matt Nichol, told Toronto press this past August that "Mike pushes himself to a level during gym sessions that few of his peers can match… [He] may be one of the strongest guys in the league ever, pound for pound."

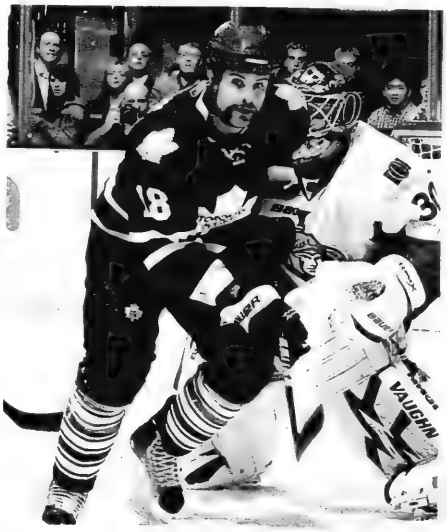
The Canadiens will be looking for increased scoring output from Cammalleri on a par with his season in Calgary. Last year, Montreal was near the bottom of the league in goals scored in even-strength situations, and Cammalleri managed but a dozen. The other seven came on the power play.

Last season, the Habs featured two players with Jewish heritage on their roster. Jeff Halpern, a veteran centre, was signed to a one-year $600,000 (US) pact. The Princeton University grad has left the Canadiens and is returning to where it all began for him in 1999-00. He's signed with the Washington Capitals, where he had previously played six years prior to moving on to Dallas, Tampa Bay and Los Angeles.

The 35-year-old undrafted skater, who has played close to 800 games in the NHL, primarily as a third- or fourth-line checker, turned out to be a real bargain when he fired 11 goals and added 15 assists last season. Les Canadiens, who would have welcomed him back, will miss the penalty-killer deluxe, along with his leadership and superb faceoff skills.

The Potomac, Md., skater, at close to six feet and 200 pounds, in addition to having had an impressive plus-minus rating of six last season, may well prove to be of good value for the often offensively minded Capitals.

Watch out as well for the son of Bob Nystrom, a four-time Stanley Cup winner with the Islanders. Eric Nystrom, 28, is a former U.S. national under-18 team member, and he was also with the U.S. junior national club. Four successful years with University of Michigan (2001-04) sufficiently impressed the Flames, who selected the six-foot-one, 195-pound left-winger 10th overall in the 2002 NHL entry draft.



Mike Brown

A tough, defensive-minded pro, Nystrom has tallied just 23 goals and added 28 assists in 286 NHL games. The son of a Jewish mother, he played three years in Calgary before joining the Minnesota Wild last season, where he played in all 82 regular-season games, scoring four goals and setting up eight others. Surprisingly, despite his aggressive style of play on the fourth line, Nystrom was assessed only 30 penalty minutes, mainly because he avoided fighting after breaking his cheekbone in December.

A real up-and-comer is Nashville Predators' defenceman Jonathon Blum, 22, a first-round selection (23rd overall) in the 2007 NHL entry draft. Well known in the Western Hockey League after four years with the Vancouver Giants, the six-foot-one, 180-pound rearguard was voted the Canadian major junior defenceman of the year in 2008-09, as well as being named a west first- and second-team all-star.

The Long Beach, Calif., skater played 54 games with the AHL's Milwaukee Admirals last season, where he had seven goals and 27 assists. After getting called up to Nashville, he had three goals and five assists in 23 regular season games. He played in all 12 playoff games, where he registered a pair of helpers.

Improving quickly, he quarterbacked the power play and was an adept defender who has established himself in the NHL. He is a mobile defenceman with an offensive style of game, yet is strong positionally. But he'll have to put more weight on his frame to handle the more solid forwards.

Mike Brown is entering his second season with the Toronto Maple Leafs. The winger with the trademark horseshoe moustache missed most of the pre-season after undergoing groin surgery in June.

Last year, the Chicago native, who stands five-foot-11 and weighs 205 pounds, notched three goals and five assists in 50 games while providing the Leafs with grit and toughness.

Winnipegger Daniel Micflikier, 27, a college star at the University of New Hampshire (2003-07), is coming off his best AHL season to date. In 2009-10 he tallied 40 points (18 goals, 22 assists) in 59 games with the Albany River Rats, and last year with the Charlotte Checkers, in 78 games, he scored 29 goals and added 32 helpers. The Carolina Hurricanes, the parent club, could do lot worse than call up the solid, feisty, five-foot-eight, 180-pound player, who has an edge to his game. Last season he spent 80 minutes in the sin bin, but recorded an impressive plus/minus of 15.

Other draftees and undrafted minor leaguers and those still in college or junior hockey whose names to watch for this year are Ethan Werek, who will play for the AHL's Portland Pirates, an affiliate of the Phoenix Coyotes. Drafted by the Rangers 47th overall in 2009, the Markham, Ont., native was traded to Phoenix in May.

Toronto native Zach Hyman, drafted 123rd overall by Florida in the 2010 entry draft, will play for the University of Michigan Wolverines.

Montreal-born Josh Tordjman will play goal for EC Red Bull Salzburg in the Austrian Hockey League; Los Angeles native Brett Sterling was sent by St. Louis Blues to their AHL affiliate in Peoria; Oren Eizenman played last year for the Connecticut Whale, the Rangers' AHL farm team; Colby Cohen, a U.S.-born defenceman, is on the roster of the Providence Bruins, Boston's minor-league affiliate; Zach Cohen, from Villanova, Pa., will join the Lake Erie Monsters of the AHL, Colorado's farm team; and Dov Grumet Morris, a goalie from Evanston, Ill., plays for the Connecticut Whale.

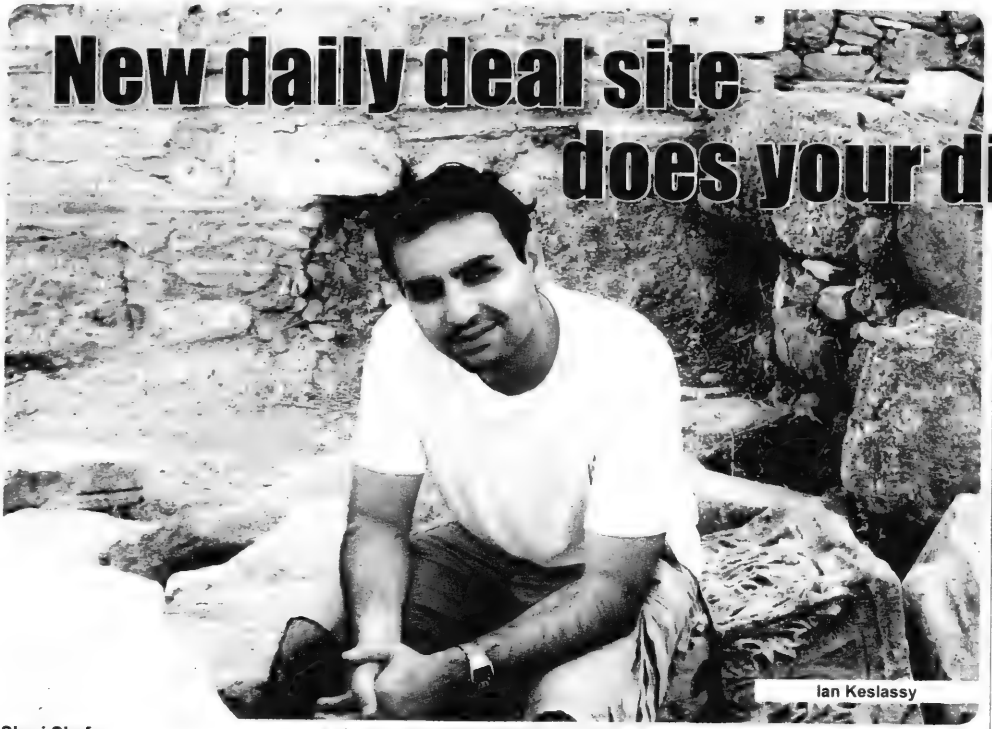
New daily deal site does your dirty work



Ian Keslassy

More news for young Jews on heebonics.ca

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Web designer Ian Keslassy said he's more than willing to do the dirty work for anyone looking for great deals.

All you have to do is provide your e-mail address, your preferences and interests, and the distance you're willing to travel for a deal, and he will filter through countless daily deal sites to find the promotions that interest you.

"There are... only 24 hours in a day," Keslassy wrote on his daily deal website, called Dealfart. "If you want to search all day, go ahead, but remember you need time to sleep, eat and enjoy life. We do the dirty work for you."

Keslassy, a 34-year-old father of two, knows first-hand the benefit of taking advantage of limited-time, money-saving deals on anything from vacations and gym memberships to restaurants and car detailing.

With the emergence of group buying sites, an online phenomenon that allows local businesses to offer vouchers and discounts on their services based on an increased demand, daily deal sites across North America have been popping up in the hundreds.

Keslassy, owner of a web design company called Extanet, said a conversation he had with his wife's cousin led to a new side project that he hopes will de-clutter e-mail inboxes across the continent.

"We realized that there were hundreds of deal sites out there, and there wasn't a way to properly filter through them to receive the ones a user wants. Once we realized that users could benefit from such a filtering mechanism, we created Dealfart to address their needs," Keslassy said.

OK, but what's with the name?

"We wanted to go with something people would remember. Something that might pique their curiosity... We figured that if it's going to work, we need to choose something that people would remember," he said with a laugh.

If you can get past the name and the icon prominently displayed on the homepage of the website – it's a cute, little monkey, who is, ahem, passing gas – Dealfart can go a long way in keeping endless e-mails from competing deal sites out of your inbox.

His site "crawls" other daily deal sites and sends you notices about promotions you'd be interested in based on the preferences you chose.

"You go onto our site and choose your preferences. If you only want deals on hair salons or spas, you can choose that category, and you'll only get deals based on what you choose," he explained.

"We'll only send you deals based on the distance you're willing to travel. So if you don't want to go beyond 40 kilometres, we won't send you deals at locations farther than 40 kilometres from where you live. We bring together all the different deal sites to one place and shoot you off one daily e-mail."

Keslassy said that in the few months since he began building the site, he has become affiliated with Toronto-based group buying sites including FabFind, DealTicker and Dealfind, and more than 30 other sites from all over North America.

He said the group buying sites provide Dealfart with unique links to the deals that they feature on their sites.

Once users decide to purchase a promotion, they are redirected to the original deal site where the coupon was first featured.

Keslassy said his site is more user friendly, because it prevents you from having to sign up to countless other sites.

"Potentially, in the morning, you could have 50, 60 e-mails from the different sites. We bring it in to one e-mail."

He said he's developed a sophisticated system because each of his subscribers receives customized e-mails, rather than mass e-mails that list deals a subscriber may have no interest in.

As an observant Jew, Keslassy said he wanted to offer his Jewish subscribers an option to sign up for preferences that aren't offered on other local sites.

"You can sign up for kosher restaurant and Jewish shopping deals," he said.

"I'm just trying to be as versatile as possible and give the users the option to choose the things that cater to their lifestyle."

Keslassy also volunteers his design talents to build websites pro bono for Jewish non-profit organizations, such as Peace of Mind, an Israeli-based program with a Toronto chapter that works with discharged Israeli soldiers who suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder and other psychological trauma.

Keslassy's company was also commissioned to build websites for Toronto-area Jewish institutions including Kollel Yismach Moshe: The Sephardic Outreach Centre, Ohr Haemet Sephardic School, and Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation.

But in the midst of running his company, Keslassy is eagerly working to package Dealfart as a refreshing take on an online phenomenon.

"For every deal site that succeeds, about 15 close down," he estimated.

Dealfart just went live last month, but the site has already acquired more than 150 subscribers.

"We're just working on trying to perfect our site now... We're always trying to add more sources as we go so we can provide more options to our subscribers," he said.

"The goal is to make our site better."

Anger management

I think that the "anger management" course (well, the "positive thinking" course) has changed me.

Yesterday, as I woke up in the middle of the night screaming in fright, Meir asked me if I was depressed. Calmly, I explained to him that I was not at all glum, only that I didn't understand the purpose of life, our meaning here. What's the point of it all? Isn't it all beside the point and miserable, too?

That evening at the course (I have only four classes left), the lecturer asked Natalie to tell Jeffrey of one thing in him that annoys her (Only one thing? Does anybody have the rest of the evening?) The discussion unfolded something like this.

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

Natalie (smiling): Well, Jeffrey's great. There's nothing's wrong with him. Okay, if I have to, I'll just say that I wasn't really happy about the way he ate his snack during the recess. I mean I like chocolate bars, too, but the way he unwrapped it, so carefully, and then he took such a little, dainty bite involving only the edges of his teeth without even getting messy. I mean, why? Why? Why not just stick your teeth into the bar and devour it? Why not get dirty?

After that, we were all silent for a while, except for Jeffrey, who held on to his left arm tightly while breathing loudly.

Lecturer: Thank you, Natalie. And now let's move on to David. David, would you…

Me: Wait a minute! Are you crazy?

Lecturer: We don't say "crazy" here.

Me: Fine. Wait a minute! Are you clinically insane? You're asking David about something new, instead of letting Jeffrey react to what has just being blathered about him to his face? The man is about to have a heart attack. You can't make him hold it in!

Lecturer (looking at her notes): So now Nina wants to be the group's therapist?

Me: If Nina has to! There's no way you're not going to let what's left of poor Jeffrey here express what he feels now, let alone deal with this maniacal and soon possibly murderer too, we used to call Natalie!

I looked at the group. "Who's with me?" I shouted, as I marched toward the lecturer.

"Who's not afraid to show her real anger? Not you, Natalie. Anyone else?"

Later, I stood outside the building. The security guys sure earned their living that night. Meir came to pick me up and we drove in silence for a while.

"They were right promising this course changes people," I said.

After a pause, he replied. "Look at you. You entered this class an angry person, and finished it way, way angrier."

130 Neptune sukkah

I just moved out of 130 Neptune into my new place.

I write this while still exhausted from the demands of schlepping boxes and scrubbing floors. I'm feeling as you all were when you moved.

I've had a lot of time to consider what these last four years have meant to me; how this sukkah, this temporary home, affected my life.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Over the last years, my boy, Noah River, slept in 130 Neptune sukkah. Those days, those nights were oh so glorious. I loved watching Noah sleep. I giggled wildly with pride at his childlike practicality and spirit. "When two yawns come at once, I push one away and yawn with the other."

I looked at his empty room and thanked the walls for protecting him from the often bitter winter winds allowed to fly freely, because of the 401, on the south side of the building. 130 Neptune sukkah and its walls were like the animal skin that protected the Jewish People in the desert.

Three years ago, I had a heart attack. I scrambled back to 130 Neptune from the eatery where my heart stumbled and unlocked the door for emergency services to come in unhindered.

As they rolled me out, through the foyer, out the front doors, I saw a child who shared 130 sukkah with me. He seemed so frightened by my circumstances, so I winked at him and gave him the thumbs up as if to say, "I'm okay, don't be afraid." That was a nuance I will never forget about 130 Neptune sukkah. I saw me in him; him in me.

The community at 130 sukkah was eclectic – young and old; frum and secular; newcomers and veterans. My neighbours across the hall were Moroccan; down the hall was a Polish family and upstairs – Indian. Our superintendent is Russian, the assistant super, Eastern Canadian. Down the hall were Serbs.

In 130 sukkah, there was a Shabbat elevator and a little red car in the playground. I waved to it and thanked the plastic vehicle for safely carrying my boy around the walkways, where he learned how to fill up its imaginary gas tank with rocks and stones.

130 Neptune sukkah was my royal palace of creativity. It was my protective cave. There I painted more than ever and wrote dozens of articles for this fine newspaper and others.

I loved Joan there.

My boyhood friends and I watched the highway traffic with great interest. I finished reading a book on Dr. Rick Hodes, a true-blue Jewish humanitarian, and studied 12 pages of tractate Rosh Hashanah with my soul friend, Yudi. This was my home.

130 Neptune sukkah was indeed temporary, just as all of our homes will be. When I walked out the door for the last time, I realized that someone else will soon move in. I knew there was another person living there before me, and before her.

And finally 130 Neptune sukkah was the place where I was me, and me entirely. Within these walls, when I was alone, I had the absolute luxury of just being at peace, at ease with myself – singing aloud, prancing about, wandering from room to room, late at night, just thinking. I thank God for my time there – my very first property – and the fruit that hung from its roof. 130 Neptune sukkah was temporary, but so are we all.

Chag Samayach. Happy Sukkot.

Finding love in a soup kitchen

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Mike Friedman and Jenny Libman

Many little girls grow up wondering where they'll meet their husband. As wild as their imaginations may be however, there are probably very few who expect to find him in the basement of the largest homeless shelter in North America.

When I graduated from university in the spring of 2007, like many other recent grads, I had no idea what to do next. My sister called me one day and told me about AVODAH: The Jewish Service Corps, a year-long service program for young professionals who are interested in learning about Judaism and social justice.

With nothing to lose, I applied to AVODAH, and when I was accepted, I relocated to Washington, D.C.. I was assigned to work at D.C. Central Kitchen (DCCK,) a community kitchen that provides meals to homeless shelters, rehabilitation clinics and other social service agencies throughout the D.C. area. They also happen to be located in the basement of the largest homeless shelter in North America.

On my first day of work I was introduced to Mike. He had been an AVODAH participant the year before, and after he completed the program, he was hired as a staff member at DCCK. Over the year, Mike and I worked together in very close quarters, but our relationship was only professional. When I said goodbye to Mike before moving back to Toronto, I think we both figured that we'd had a fun time together as colleagues, and that maybe we'd remain long distance friends through e-mails or maybe an occasional phone call.

Of course, since I am writing this story, our relationship did not end when I left D.C.. After being home for just a few days I got an e-mail from Mike saying that he missed me. I quickly responded and told him I was so glad he felt the same way I did. Though we were no longer in the same city, the next phase of our relationship had begun. We spent the next several months talking on the phone, sending e-mails, and flying to see each other as often as we could.

In February of 2009, in the midst of the recession, Mike quit his job to move to Toronto. He believed that our relationship was important, and that no job was worth it if we were living so far apart.

Fast forward two years, and Mike and I were still happily dating. One evening I was working late when I got a phone call from Mike. "Jenny, are you almost home? I'm so hungry!" Since this was a typical phone call (he is always hungry), I didn't think much of it. "I'll be home in 30 minutes," I said. "I'm pretty sure there are some leftovers in the fridge."

When I got back to our apartment, I was shocked to find, not my boyfriend eating leftover chicken on the couch, but an apartment filled with candles and rose petals, and All You Need is Love by The Beatles playing. Immediately, I burst into tears. Mike got down on one knee and presented me with a beautiful engagement ring that was passed down to him from his great-grandmother. He asked me to marry him and somehow, through all my tears, I managed to say yes.

We are planning our wedding for next summer and are excited for all the adventures to come!

I was a sucker for public displays of affection. My boyfriend Jack, not so much. So when he saw me bawling my eyes out at a scene from the TV show Dawson's Creek, where Pacey declared his love for Audrey over the airport's loudspeaker, Jack knew that when he proposed, he'd get the biggest bang for his buck if it was public.

So, after a long 18 months of dating, Jack made plans for us to spend a weekend at the Viamede Resort in the Kawarthas. It was lovely, with a private cottage and lots of activities to keep us active for the weekend. I suspected a proposal that weekend, but tried not to stress about when, where and how it might happen.

Proposal during special weekend get away

Jack pulled out all the stops to make the weekend special, like a note we received, supposedly from resort management, sprinkled with racy innuendo. Jack's sheepish look clued me in.

At the Friday evening dinner, we had a stunning bouquet of flowers on our table. It took me a while to notice that our centrepiece was different from the others, but I finally realized he had planned it.

The evening entertainment was an Elvis and Marilyn Monroe impersonation act. Jack insisted we stay, even though I was tired, and suggested we just head back to our cottage for a cozy and romantic night in. He was adamant: "I really like Elvis songs. This could be fun."

The show was quite entertaining, I admit. Marilyn did her bit; then it was Elvis's turn. A few songs in, Elvis started singing, "It's now or never, come hold me tight... Kiss me my darling, be mine tonight. It's now or never... folks, there's someone who has something important to say... and it really is now or never, so Jack... the spotlight is yours."

Huh?? Jack bounded onto the stage, and took the microphone. I realized what was happening, and I couldn't stop thinking, "Oh my God, oh my God..."

Then Jack expressed his love – short but sweet – in front of over 100 people he's never met before. That was HUGE for him. He came over to me – microphone still in hand – kneeled and said, "Will you do me the honour of becoming my wife so we can spend the rest of our lives together?"

I'm not even sure I said yes. I just kept my hands over my mouth, saying "Oh my God..." Everyone was applauding and cheering (and laughing), and we stood there in the spotlight hugging, laughing and crying a bit too. Jack didn't have a ring for me at that time, but presented me with a cardboard ring he'd drawn, with one orange carrot on it.

We were celebrities the whole weekend, probably in the spotlight more than Elvis and Marilyn were. I think Jack upstaged them, and I'm so glad he did.

Sixty years travelling together

Sheila Balaban
Special to The CJN

In memory of Barry Short, who died after this article was written.

Barry and Sylvia Short of Thornhill celebrated their 60th wedding anniversary on July 14.

Barry was born on Jan. 7, 1924, in Winnipeg, where he grew up with siblings Harvey and Sylvia. A champion, all-round athlete in his youth, Barry was very active in tennis, soccer, baseball, boxing, bowling, swimming and billiards. For most of his adult life, he was an avid golfer. Even in his 80s, he amazed his golfing buddies when he occasionally came very close to "shooting his age."

Courtship began at bus stop

When Barry first applied to university in Winnipeg, he was turned down, as they had an annual quota of only 14 Jews in their study program. He had to wait until the following year to be accepted into medicine, and his studies were subsequently cut short when he enlisted in the Canadian Air Force.

After World War II, he joined Canadian National Railway (CN), where he worked as a wire chief, transmitting Morse code orders to the engineers.

Sylvia, also affectionately known as Faigie, was born in Winnipeg on Feb. 6, 1926, one of six Loeb sisters.

Barry and Sylvia met while waiting for the bus; Barry finally got up the courage to ask her out after the second week of seeing her at the bus stop. Barry reminisces, "Every day, I would run to catch the bus and hope to find Sylvia there."

Those bus rides were only the first of many journeys in their lives together, as CN took them, in 1952, from Winnipeg to Saskatoon, where their son Brian and daughter Jeri were born. Their next train journey, in 1956, was to frigid Fort Churchill, Man., for a two-year CN stint.

After the birth of their daughter, Lori, in 1958, the family moved back to Winnipeg and enjoyed life there until 1966, when Barry accepted a promotion and they packed up one last time and moved to Toronto.

Sylvia and Barry Short

Sylvia remarks, "It's so much warmer in Toronto than living up north in Churchill with the polar bears."

In Toronto, Sylvia no longer had to deal with laundry freezing into solid sheets on the clotheslines or ensuring that the family car was plugged in so it would start in the morning, and she happily returned to the workplace as a legal secretary.

The couple enjoyed playing competitive bridge and were often spotted either on the golf course or on the dance floor. "When the right song [came] up on the radio, TV or computer, I [would] sometimes find my parents twirling a little in the living room," Brian remembered.

In later life, Barry loved watching every sports channel on TV with his headphones on, while Sylvia was busy baking, cooking, sewing, listening to music (opera, classical and Israeli), catching up on her e-mail or tending to the container flower garden on their oversized patio.

Spending time with family always brought great joy to Barry and Sylvia, especially opening their home to grandchildren David and Jeffrey, from Oakville, and Raviv, from Israel.

Leikin a wizard with words

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

When your big simchah rolls around, you want to do things right.

That means saying what you truly wish, something that can be difficult for many people.

But if you're having any trouble with it, then perhaps Molly Leikin can help.

"My company is called Anything With Words and I write whatever the occasion needs," Leikin said.

"I write very serious things, I write very funny things, and most importantly, I get to know the person so that I can write accordingly for the person who's going to be delivering it."

An Oscar-winning songwriter, Leikin feels that being able to give vows, toasts or speeches is a very important part of a wedding.

"This is a legacy that the bride and groom are leaving," Leikin said. "Everything from the paper napkins to the toast are part of this legacy, and I take great joy and pride in being part of such a wonderful celebration."

She recognizes the fact that no two people – or families – are alike.

"Everyone has a fingerprint," Leikin said. "I like to find out about the person delivering [what I'm writing], but I also like to get to know about the family, both sides of it, so that whatever I can contribute is extremely personal and one-of-a-kind, just like the occasion."

In order to properly do her research, Leikin will speak to as many people as possible who are involved with the soon-to-be married couple.

Molly Leikin

"I love to talk to everyone in the family to see what they can bring to the bride and groom," Leikin said. "This way, I have a bit of everybody's heart in what I write."

But the biggest thing that she will do is attempt to figure out what makes the involved parties' relationship what it is.

"I spend lots of time asking them about their family, their relationship to the bride and groom, and what they want to say to them that only they can say," Leikin said. "Everyone has their own special relationship to the person.

"Each relationship is very special and I want the words that I write to represent that relationship, because there's a lot of personal contact here."

Along with her writing services, Leikin can also produce one-of-a-kind wedding proposals that are currently running at a 100 per cent success rate.

"My first client was a guy who had asked his girlfriend to marry him three times and had failed," Leikin said. "He said to me, 'maybe you can help me out here.'"

"The fourth time, she said yes, so it must have been what I wrote."

Leikin greatly enjoys what she does.

"It's all for joy and it's all for a happy occasion," Leikin said. "It's nice to focus on those because there is so much sadness in the world.

"It makes me feel like a mensch to make people happy," added Leikin.

She can be booked in advance or at the last minute, if necessary.

"I've written things overnight that have been extraordinary and more important, have been right for my people," Leikin said.

She is very dedicated to her work.

"It's not a hobby, it's my passion," Leikin said. "I feel that it's a mitzvah for me to be able to do this and I'm very gratified by the response of families who have called me.

"I look forward to being part of many more celebrations in the Canadian Jewish community."

To book an appointment with Leikin, you can reach her, toll-free, at 800-851-6588.

Folklorist studies Jewish courtship and dating

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Jillian Gould, an assistant professor in the department of Folklore at Memorial University of Newfoundland, grew up hearing the story of her parents' courtship, which began with a blind date on Christmas Eve in the early 1960s.

Sadly, Gould's mother died last year of cancer. At the funeral, her father spoke of their first date, recalling how he drove in circles instead of taking her directly home, so smitten he didn't want the evening to end.

In part, their "courtship narrative," as Gould calls it, was the impetus for her latest research project: "Three Generations of Jewish Courtship and Dating Rituals: from Shtetl Matchmaking to JDate."

She said it became clear to her "how that story framed their entire relationship and their lifetime together."

From an academic perspective, Jewish courtship narratives are not only personal, but reflect a historic moment and provide social context about families and the Jewish community as well as Jewish culture and values that people share over time, Gould said.

She hopes to have all her interviews completed by next spring, and is still seeking more people to share their stories. Her study is divided into three parts – the matchmaker in eastern Europe, blind dates in Toronto from the 1920s through the 1950s, and Jewish Internet dating.

Jillian Gould

In October, she will present a paper at the American Folklore Society Conference called A Match Made in Jdate Heaven: Jewish Courtship Narratives in the Digital Age.

Gould herself fits into the demographic she is studying: she met her husband, Jeremy Citrome, on JDate in 2006.

Because Citrome, now a visiting assistant professor of English at Memorial University, was teaching at Wilfrid Laurier University's Brantford campus at the time, and Gould was in Toronto, she said she thought of him more as a friend than a potential date. They e-mailed every so often for a couple of months until he suggested meeting on his next trip to Toronto. Within a year, they were married, and are now the parents of a one-year-old daughter.

For her project, Gould will draw in part on her research for her 2009 PhD thesis, which focused on residents of Baycrest in Toronto and how they create a sense of home within an institutional context.

One woman, now a great-grandmother in her 90s, had spurned the idea of a matchmaker, preferring to "meet someone for love," Gould said. She fell in love with her husband's deep brown eyes and told Gould that those eyes "go for generations."

Working with the mostly female residents of Baycrest was interesting in a way Gould didn't anticipate. "I was trying to write their stories, and they were trying to write mine as well. I can't tell you how many people tried to set me up. They couldn't believe I was in my early 30s and didn't have a husband. And they wanted me to. This idea of Jewish continuity – they wanted to be there to witness it."

Gould's mother also used to try to set her up. "She'd say, 'You never know,'" Gould recalls. "There's that idea of hopefulness… We know somebody we like and we care about, and we want to see them in a relationship."

Although she expects to find certain similarities when she compares stories from different generations, Gould said that "the great thing about research is you don't necessarily know what direction it will go in."

Her field of study – folklore – is an offshoot of anthropology that is better known in the United States, where every state has a state folklorist.

Folklorists are ethnographers who write and tell the story of people and their culture, Gould explained. Among the subjects of her previous research projects are Jewish candy stores in Brooklyn and the culture of family-run fish 'n' chips shops in St. John's.

Gould encountered folklorists for the first time in the late 1990s when she worked as education co-ordinator at the Eldridge Street Project (now the Museum at Eldridge Street) in New York. She was fascinated by their work, and remembers thinking, "This is what I want to do."

Anyone who is interested in sharing a courtship story with Gould can contact her at jgould@mun.ca.

Hurricane Irene makes wedding memorable

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

When Connie Smilowitz's daughter, Talya, became engaged last winter, the two women went into planning mode. A lot of time and thought went into the details of the wedding, but when Hurricane Irene struck the day of the simchah, all those plans went into a tailspin.

During the months leading up to the late-summer wedding, Connie (née Dollin), a former Montrealer now living in Hartford, Conn., would update me regularly on the arrangements—the venue, music, menu, table-settings, flowers, her dress, the bride's gown, the seating, etc.

It was all typical wedding stuff, and as an old friend – we've known each other since kindergarten – I was happy to hear the wedding plans were progressing well.

Smilowitz simchahs have one unusual feature: Connie's husband, Henry, always prepares some of the food. For Talya's wedding, he spent several days in the shul's kitchen along with the groom's parents making gazpacho, vegan stir-fry and a Moroccan chick pea stew for 200 guests.

The instant bonding between the machatanim (future in-laws) – could be attributed to the unusual way the betrothed couple met. Henry, a biochemistry professor, taught Daniel Morris, his future son-in-law, in Daniel's first year of medical school at the University of Connecticut.

Henry came to know his future son-in-law better after Daniel accompanied a mutual friend with cerebral palsy to the Smilowitzes' home for Sukkot and several Shabbat dinners.

Henry said, "I would often ask myself, 'Why can't Talya meet a nice guy like Daniel?' It never occurred to me to introduce them."

But that meeting was bashert. In 2010, the Smilowitzes invited Daniel to their seder. Talya, a New York City (N.Y.C.)-based singer and cantor, was also there. She made sure she was sitting beside him that evening.

"Daniel was very handsome and I knew my parents really liked him. So I decided to get to know him." Nine months later, the couple announced their engagement.

Halachic law may have been the guiding principle underlying the marriage ceremony, but in the final days before the simchah, Murphy's Law took precedence.

The wedding date was Aug. 28, the very day Hurricane Irene was set to strike northeastern states like Connecticut and New York.

On the Friday before the big day, the synagogue informed the Smilowitzes that the wedding could not take place there due to safety concerns about the impending storm. With less than two hours before Shabbat, the families scrambled to remove the food from the shul and store it before sundown in the hotel room refrigerators of out-of town guests.

By this time, N.Y.C. was getting ready to shut down services as a precautionary measure. Highways and transit systems were closing in preparation for the hurricane. Talya began receiving slews of text messages and e-mails from her friends.

Half the invited guests were scheduled to travel to Hartford from N.Y.C. the day of the wedding and now they were all cancelling. The videographer, some musicians and the makeup and hair people had also cancelled.

Breaking the mould, while keeping with tradition

Abby Feferman
Special to The CJN

The words "small," "Jewish," and "wedding" are seldom found in the same sentence. These days, Jewish weddings are large, lavish affairs where the bride and groom are like celebrities. If you're lucky, you get a quick "hello," but beyond that, you're mostly gazing at them through a towering centrepiece from your corner table.

Ben and I are not your conventional Jewish couple. We both work in creative fields: he as a film producer, and I as a wardrobe stylist. We do things like go to Burning Man and honeymoon in Morocco. I make jewelry. Ben has a ponytail… get the picture? We also love hosting Shabbat dinners for our friends and family, and being part of our vibrant Jewish community.

When it came time to plan our wedding, we knew we wanted to break down some barriers. Our number 1 priority was to have a fun, intimate party where we could look around the room, and feel a connection with each person. We kept our family guest list "one deep" – if you have been at my Pesach seder, you make the cut. We didn't invite long-lost friends, or people we would not feel comfortable calling up to say hi.

Ben and Abby Feferman

We also chose to forgo long speeches, a head table and waiting an age for the food to come (the fish course was on your plate when you sat down). Our band felt more like a group of Israeli rock stars. They played a rendition of David Melech that had a riff from a Lenny Kravitz song.

Despite wanting to break conventions in some aspects of our wedding, it was very important to us to keep it traditional. We wanted to incorporate all of the beautiful customs that our grandparents and their grandparents included in their weddings, like the breaking of the plate, and the kabbalat panim.

The first time I witnessed the custom of kabbalat panim, I was completely blown away. I knew that when it came time for my wedding, it was something I wanted to include. Ben and I went the full nine yards, and didn't see or speak to each other for a week before the wedding. When the time came for him to be danced over to me, the moment was charged with emotion, so heightened and real.

The energy at our wedding was palpable, almost magical. It personified the beautiful song that is sung at a Jewish wedding: "The voice of jubilation and the voice of joy, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride" (Jeremiah 33:11).

The fun continued even after the wedding. We chose to have a week of Sheva Brachot, seven blessings, so we could include those who were not at the wedding in our celebration. The basic mitzvah of the Sheva Brachot is for one person to be present each night who was not at the wedding. That being the case, we fulfilled that mitzvah tenfold! Having a different group to celebrate with each night gave us the chance to have meaningful interactions. If we had opted for a large wedding, we would have had mere seconds to greet each of our guests. Instead, we had the opportunity to linger and chat and make a kesher, connection.

Some say your wedding is the most important night of your life. For us, it was more of a kickoff party; the important part comes after.

No obstacles to true love

Rabbi Nir Barkin stands under the chupah

Lisa Newman
Special to The CJN

My late husband used to say, "Every problem, no matter how great, eventually yields to effort." I learned how right he was while planning my daughter's wedding.

My daughter Dana and her fiancé Arnon specifically wanted our old friend Rabbi Nir Barkin of Modi'in, Israel to officiate at their wedding in Toronto in July. I was tasked with getting him credentialled here. I thought, with my usual can-do optimism, "How difficult could that be?"

I soon found out: two months of very limited communication with the Ontario marriage office left me frustrated and no further ahead.

My telephone calls (to their Thunder Bay long-distance number, no 1-800 option) were answered only by voicemail, which told me processing of my request would take four to six weeks. And then one day, I was informed that the entire application was being returned, thrown out because the supporting letter from a helpful Toronto rabbi, appended to Rabbi Barkin's Israeli documentation, was invalid, not being from the appropriate "governing official."

When I queried this, trying to learn who the real "governing official" might be or who else I might speak with, the (not very) civil servant said she could reveal no information because of privacy concerns, and then she hung up on me. What to do? My MPP and the provincial Ombudsman tried mightily to help, but could not cut through the bureaucracy.

And then I had an inspiration. We Jews, an often anarchic bunch, lack the hierarchical structure of those Christian denominations who were the majority stakeholders when these regulations were promulgated. This was a matter of diversity!

And indeed the Ontario diversity office was very helpful and kindly referred me to a senior bureaucrat, after which it was pretty smooth sailing till Rabbi Barkin received his temporary authorization in time for the wedding.

My husband's motto could certainly also describe our construction of Dana and Arnon's home-made, one-of-a-kind chupah, our interpretation of an Internet photo that they both particularly liked. Of course, the photo did not come with any measurements or instructions; we had to improvise it all.

First, Arnon constructed a frame of PVC poles anchored in concrete and connected with plumbing connectors. Then I sewed white "sleeves" to cover the black PVC; we used white medical tape freely for attaching them. Next, the ceiling of the structure, a lovely embroidered tablecloth from my friend Pearl, was attached to the frame with Velcro straps. And finally, with 20 yards of nine-foot-wide white chiffon, I sewed billowing drapes for all four corners and a generous, gathered "bunting" to go around the top.

After much consultation, several "fittings," where we set it up in my garage, and some indispensable help on site, that chupah shone as a highlight of Dana's very special day.

Freilech wedding despite the weather

At Shabbat morning services, it was hard for the Smilowitz and Morris families to conceal their stress. The caterer, the band, the photographer and the florist were all set for the simchah, but there was no venue.

Several conference rooms at the hotel had been booked, but the space was too small for a wedding, even with only half the invitees attending.

On Saturday night the hotel offered the families the back breakfast room and the lounge area, an open two-storey space that could accommodate all the guests. When the flowers arrived and the chupah was set up, the room was completely transformed.

Friends and family helped the bridal party with makeup and hair and a good friend became the stand-in videographer. And while the bride did not get to walk down the proverbial aisle, she did make a grand entrance descending a spiral staircase.

It all turned out to be a very freilech evening of eating, drinking, shmoozing and dancing. The affair may not have been the wedding they'd planned, but Talya described it as an "amazing time. It was best wedding ever." And all the drama had certainly made the simchah a memorable one for the guests.

As for Connie and Henry Smilowitz, they will be able to relive the simchah through the video, photographs, and the 10-month supply of Moroccan stew, sweet potato kugel, poached salmon and gazpacho – all the leftovers from the 100 guests who did not make it to the wedding – now stored in their freezer.

Father of the bride prepares part of wedding meal

2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1 large onion, diced
2 red potatoes cut into chunks
1 butternut squash, peeled seeded and cubed
2 carrots, peeled and sliced horizontally
1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/2 tsp. salt
1 tsp. ground cumin
1 can diced tomatoes with juice
1 can chick peas, drained and rinsed
1 cup vegetable stock
1/4 cup dried apricots,chopped
1/4 cup raisins

Heat the oil in a large saucepan or Dutch oven over medium high heat until hot. Add potatoes, squash, onion and carrots and cook, covered, for 5 minutes, or until onions are golden brown. Add chick peas, apricots, raisins, tomatoes, stock. Season with spices and salt. Bring to a boil and reduce to simmer. Continue cooking for 30 minutes or until vegetables are tender when pierced with a fork. Serve with couscous. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

CONNIE'S SWEET POTATO KUGEL

Prepared for the wedding by the caterer.

4 large sweet potato or yams, quartered and steamed
1/3 cup brown sugar
juice of 1/2 a lemon

Talya Smilowitz and Daniel Morris

2 tsp. olive oil
salt to taste
1/2 cup pitted prunes
extra sugar, to taste, depending on the sweetness of the potatoes

Preheat oven to 325 degrees. Let potatoes cool so they can be easily peeled. Meanwhile, place prunes in a small saucepan and cover with water. Cook prunes on medium heat for three minutes or until prunes soften.

In a large bowl, mash potatoes. Add olive oil, lemon juice, salt and sugar to taste. Mix well. Add prunes and combine with potato mixture. Place potato prune mixture in an 8- x 11-inch casserole dish. Cover with foil and bake for 55 minutes. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

GAZPACHO

From the Moosewood Cookbook.

4 cups cold tomato juice
1 small onion, minced
2 cups tomatoes, freshly diced or canned
1 cup minced green pepper
1 tsp. honey
1 clove garlic, crushed
1 cucumber, diced
2 scallions, chopped
juice of 1/2 lemon juice of 1 lime
2 tbsp. wine vinegar
1 tsp. tarragon
1 tsp. dill
1 tsp. basil
dash of ground cumin
1/4 cup parsley, freshly chopped
dash of hot sauce
2 tbsp. olive oil
salt and black pepper to taste

Combine all the ingredients and chill for at least 2 hours. The ingredients can also be pureed in a blender. Makes 6 servings.

Love when you least expect it

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Four flower girls is a rarity, but Avie and Vicki Aaron's wedding was no ordinary simchah. The girls were the grandchildren of the bride and groom, who were walked down the aisle by their adult children.

The couple were married on a warm August morning and the bride looked stunning in an off-white silk and satin gown. Two matrons of honour and the four flower girls preceded her down the aisle.

The wedding was an elegant affair: about 130 guests from both sides of the border attended a sumptuous brunch at the Richmond Hill Country Club.

Avie and Vicki met and fell in love in January of 2009, when they happened to be on the same Caribbean cruise.

Coincidentally, the Princess ship they travelled on was the same cruise line featured on the iconic TV show Love Boat. In fact, Vicki's son sang the theme from the show at the wedding.

Avie, 67, was a widower and father of two from Toronto. He was on holiday with a group of friends, most of them couples. Vicki, 66, a retired teacher and single mother from Columbia, Md., was travelling with her sister-in-law.

Their meeting with Avie was serendipitous, as Vicki tells it. On their first day at sea, she and her sister-in-law were at the pool when they began talking with one of Avie's friends.

"Shelly [Manilla] was very gregarious. He started a conversation with us. He said he was travelling with his wife and that one of his friends was single.

"My sister-in-law perked up. I made it clear that I was not looking for a future relationship."

Somehow the two women kept bumping into "the Canadian group," as Vicki refers to them. And she did notice Avie. "I thought he was very handsome and charming in his own quiet way."

In Aruba, she turned out to be a good omen for him. Before he went to the casino she rubbed his arm for good luck. He ended up winning $250 at the casino, and crediting her for the windfall. "He said, 'You're my good-luck charm.' "

He thanked her with a big bear-hug. She suggested he buy her a drink at dinner. Their friendship developed from there, Vicki says. She and her sister-in-law ended up going to dinners and visiting the various ports of call with "the Canadians."

Her sister-in-law noticed the budding romance quickly. "She said, 'You're oblivious, but I can tell he's interested. You don't see the way he looks at you.' I thought she was saying that to make me feel good."

Avie and Vickie Aaron

The couple's friendship really began to blossom during their intimate late-night talks over cappuccinos, says Vicki, explaining that it was basically their only time alone together.

By the end of the two-week cruise, Vicki and Avie were smitten with each other. "I knew we would be in touch after the cruise… It was very exciting.

"I had had an unexpectedly interesting time with a wonderful man who happened to be very handsome.

"I knew he was someone special. I could see myself spending my life with him."

When she got home from the cruise, Avie had already left her a voicemail. "He said, 'I wanted to let you know that I enjoyed meeting you on the cruise. I will call you later.'

"From the time the cruise ended, we spoke every single day. We would see each other once a month.

"We met, we became friends, and then we fell in love."

Avie, who's in the needle trade, does a lot of business in the United States, and he would stop in Columbia after business trips. Vicki also visited Toronto.

His family – two children and six grandchildren – welcomed her immediately, Vicki says. "They were very warm and very friendly. They were thrilled that Avie had met someone."

By the fall of 2009, the long-distance courtship culminated in a marriage proposal. "I was visiting and Avie said, 'What do you think about us getting married? I hope you're going to say yes.'"

He had purchased a diamond from Israel, says Vicki. He presented it to her on New Year's Eve, about a year after they first met.

The couple recently celebrated their first anniversary and Vicki is now happily ensconced in Toronto. Her advice for older single women: "Don't give up hope.

"You will find your Prince Charming when you're least expecting it."

Champagne adds romance to dinner

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

When Dom Perignon invented the crème de la crème of spirits in the 17th century, little did he know the drink he discovered while trying to eradicate those "irksome bubbles" from his wine would be considered so romantic that wedding guests wouldn't think of toasting generations of brides and grooms with anything else.

At a wedding rehearsal, bride and groom take the first step toward their long-awaited moment under the chuppah.

Minutes later, after the bride has radiantly completed her run-through, the groom is glorying in the attention and the flower girl has perfected peddling her petals, the best man raises a flute of champagne and toasts the happy couple whereupon the wedding party glides toward the first official event of this special weekend — the rehearsal dinner, where the bride and groom will receive at least a hundred more toasts.

Since today's weddings are rife with new traditions, why not buy a few extra bottles of champagne and cook your rehearsal dinner with a burst of the bubbly? While it seems unorthodox to heat a liquid so precious that it has sold for as much as $25,000 a bottle, chefs praise the results.

Josiah Citrin, chef/owner of Melisse in Santa Monica, cooks with champagne for the same reason he uses fresh truffles or searches out the best foie gras or caviar.

"A dish is only as elegant as its ingredients," he says. "Champagne adds a touch of romance, a certain finesse. Its subtle acidity is the perfect foil for butter which is why I use it in beurre blanc and other fish sauces." Citrin often cooks with a moderately-priced champagne, then finishes the dish with a splash of a more expensive variety.

When deciding which label of champagne or sparkling wine to cook with, it's important to really like the flavor, says Finbar Kinsella, formerly of Lilly's in Louisville, Kentucky. "It doesn't have to be as expensive as the champagne you'll be drinking but if you don't like it in the glass you won't like it on your plate," he emphasizes. "The myth that the taste will be diffused in the cooking process is just that."

Cooking with the world's most celebratory drink is perfect for a wedding, says New York chef Jerome Vidy. Originally from Apt, in the south of France, Vidy remembers, "It's very French to always have a bottle of wine in the house, but if there's a bottle of champagne chilling in the fridge, you know something special is coming up. Carrying over the flavor from your flute to your plate is a wonderful way to toast your love," he says.

Vidy emphasizes care when cooking with champagne, since its sparkle rarely lasts more than a half hour. "Assemble your ingredients, pop the cork, and then use it immediately. In between additions, keep it in a cool place. Of course it's fun to get a head start on celebrating by drinking and toasting as you cook."

So serve the whole mishpachah at your rehearsal dinner a menu where every dish is infused with champagne. And, just as the rehearsal dinner is the official run-through for the wedding, a meal infused with this most festive beverage will be good practice for your first official dinner as a couple — which, hopefully, you will be cooking together.

Wouldn't it be fitting if it was also filled with the liquid of love?

CHAMPAGNE LEEK SOUP WITH CAVIAR

From Josiah Citrin, chefowner of Melisse Restaurant, Santa Monica, Calif.

Soup

1 cup white onion, sliced
2 garlic cloves, crushed
5 tbsp. butter, or more if needed, divided
2 quarts diced leeks, white part only
salt to taste
1 cup champagne
2 small Yukon gold potatoes, peeled and cut into quarters
1 sprig fresh thyme
1 quart vegetable stock
2 cups water
1/2 cup cream

Garnish

1 cup diced leeks, white part only
1/2 cup cream
1 cup diced white potatoes
1 sprig thyme
1 bay leaf
1/4 cup champagne
2 oz. kosher caviar

For Soup: On a low flame sweat onions and garlic in 2 tablespoons butter until translucent, about 2 minutes, adding more butter if the mixture gets dry. Add leeks and a pinch of salt; continue cooking 2 minutes longer. Add 1 cup champagne, raise heat, and reduce the mixture by half, making sure it doesn't boil. Add potatoes, thyme, vegetable stock and water. Bring to a boil; reduce heat and simmer for 30 minutes. Add 1/2 cup cream. Bring to a boil again, immediately reduce heat to a simmer; cook for 10 minutes. Blend until smooth. Strain through a chinois sieve.

For Garnish: Sweat leeks in butter, about 3 to 4 minutes. Add 1/2 cup cream; cook until leeks are soft, about 2 minutes more. Boil potatoes with thyme and bay leaf until just cooked through. Drain and add white potatoes to leek-cream mixture. Mix well. Heat soup; add 2 tablespoons butter and 1/4 cup champagne. Blend until light and frothy. Pour into a warmed soup tureen. Reheat leek mixture, adding a bit of butter, if needed.

To Serve: Place about 1 tbsp. of the leek mixture in the centre of 6 soup bowls. Garnish with caviar. Carefully ladle the soup around the leeks so that the garnish is floating on top. Makes 6 servings.

Exhibit brings vintage wedding dresses to life

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Every woman wants to find the perfect dress for her wedding day. And after months of searching, a number of fittings and several hundred dollars, that perfect dress usually ends up hanging in the back of her closet. Sure, she may look at it from time to time to bring back memories of her special day, but the reality is that the life of most wedding dresses is quite short.

Joy Fine, creator of the exhibit Weddings in History, wants to change that. She wants to give wedding dresses the opportunity to share stories of couples long after the wedding night is over. Fine has been building her collection of vintage wedding dresses since 2002, and this summer was the launch of her exhibit, which highlights trends in wedding wear over the last 150 years.

"I've always been fascinated by fashion trends," said Fine. "I thought it would be interesting to see the progression of wedding attire."

Fine explained that the tradition of brides wearing white started in 1840 with Queen Victoria. "White symbolized purity and modesty. All of the upper class women of the time wanted to be seen this way."

Trends have changed over the years, with dresses getting both longer and shorter, and personalized with things like lace, sequins and splashes of colour. "Even during years where most women could not afford to buy a new dress for their wedding, they would wear the fanciest thing they owned."

All of the dresses in the Weddings in History exhibit are identified with the name of the bride who wore the dress, and the date of the wedding. "We want to show more than just what the dresses of the time looked like," said Fine. "We want to give the dress an identity. By including the story of the bride and groom it really brings the dress to life."

One of the wedding dresses in the exhibit was worn by a young bride who was marrying a soldier in the 1940s. The man asked special permission to board the next ship so he would have time to get married. The next day it was discovered that the ship he was originally assigned to had been attacked and there were no survivors. "That wedding saved his life!" said Fine.

Another woman donated two dresses to the exhibition – a hand-me-down gown that she got from her sister and wore to her wedding, and her dream dress that she purchased when she and her husband renewed their vows 25 years later.

Fine gets her dresses by purchasing online or through personal donations. She doesn't shop in thrift stores because she wouldn't be able to identify who the dress belonged to. Her collection includes dresses from celebrities Phyllis Diller and Lynn Johnston.

Bridal gowns feature in exhibit

"People are usually thrilled to donate their dresses to me, because it means their happy stories will be shared with a large audience."

Weddings in History opened in Alexandria and Cornwall this summer, and will be traveling throughout Ontario next year.

Israelis feel angst on the eve of Gilad's release

Gilad Schalit's father, Noam, right prepares to plant an Israeli flag outside his home in Mitzpe Hila in anticipation of his son's release from more than five years in Gaza as a captive of Hamas. In the photo, left, members of some of the families of victims of terror attacks perpetrated by Palestinians to be freed in exchange for Schalit's freedom demonstrated their opposition to the terms of the exchange outside the Supreme Court in Jerusalem on Monday. [Israel Sun and Flash90 photos] Please see related stories on pages 4, 8, 21 and 35.

JTA

JERUSALEM — Less than 48 hours before the Israel-Hamas negotiated release of Gilad Schalit, Israel's Supreme Court said it would consider petitions by terror victims' families to cancel the prisoner swap deal that would see the Israeli soldier freed in exchange for 1,027 Palestinian prisoners.

Under the terms of the deal, Schalit, who was captured in a cross-border raid by Hamas-linked gunmen in 2006, was scheduled to return to Israel via Egypt on Tuesday, at the same time as the first set of Palestinian prisoners are returned to Gaza and the West Bank. Some Palestinian prisoners will also be deported abroad.

The court said it would hold a hearing before a three-justice panel at noon Monday to consider a petition filed by the Almagor Terror Victims Association against the release of the prisoners. The association also asked the court to delay the releases to allow more time to study the list and make objections. Several families have filed separate petitions against the release of particular prisoners.

Schalit's parents, Noam and Aviva, wrote to the court asking it to dismiss the petitions, fearing that the deal was too fragile to endure any delay.

"We sympathize with the pain of the families of the terror victims, but ask that the court not make any change, however small, to the deal made by the government," they wrote. "Any delay, however small, will put Gilad's life in danger."

Similar appeals on prisoner exchange deals in the past were unsuccessful, with the court declaring that it would not intervene in what it considers a political and security issue.

At The CJN's deadline on Monday, the court had not yet reached a decision.

Israel's Prison Service late Saturday night published the list of the 477 prisoners to be released in the first stage of the Schalit deal. According to Israeli law, the names of the prisoners to be released must be made public 48 hours before the scheduled release to allow for appeals against their release.

Another 550 prisoners are scheduled for release in two months.

More Museum Cash

WINNIPEG — The group Friends of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights has raised $130 million in private donations, close to its $150-million fundraising goal, it said earlier this month. The rest of the cost of the $310-million national museum – the only one to be located outside Ottawa – is being funded by three levels of government. The museum, the brainchild of late media mogul Israel Asper, whose family is raising funds for it, is being built in Winnipeg and is slated to open in 2013.

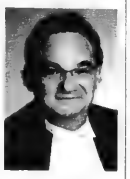
'Rabbi' Arrested

TORONTO — A former lawyer who calls himself a rabbi was arrested Oct. 11 in Toronto and faces extradition to the United States for allegedly running a massive immigration fraud scheme. U.S. authorities say Earl Seth David, 47, who used the name Avraham David, ran a multimillion-dollar operation with 26 others providing fake papers for thousands of undocumented immigrants from 1996 to 2009 through his New York law practice. He lived as a rabbi, writing scholarly articles and a book on Torah. He also claims descent from a chassidic dynasty, and was involved in a downtown Toronto shul. A Canadian citizen, he became a lawyer in New York in 1988 and practised there until he was suspended in 2004 for an unrelated incident. He fled to Canada in 2006.

Hotel Nixes Meeting

TORONTO — Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) praised the Sheraton Centre in Toronto for cancelling a Muslim conference at the hotel that Jewish and gay groups said was to include antisemitic and anti-gay speakers. FSWC said the "extremist British Islamic organization" Islamic Education and Research Academy's (IERA) Oct. 23 "Calling the World Back to Allah" conference had speakers who have called Jews "cursed," "filth," and urged the death of gays. The hotel reportedly cancelled the meeting over a contractual issue, but the FSWC said the IERA plans to hold the conference at the Canadian headquarters of the Islamic Society of North America in Mississauga.

Ont. Judge Nominated To Supreme Court



Michael Moldaver

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Stephen Harper named Michael Moldaver to the Supreme Court on Monday, bringing the number of Jews on the top court to four, out of a total of nine.

Moldaver replaces Justice Ian Binnie, 72. Harper also named Ontario Court of Appeal Judge Andromache Karakatsanis to the Supreme Court. She replaces Justice Louise Charron, 60. Charron and Binnie announced their retirements in May.

The Peterborough, Ont.,-born Moldaver graduated from the University of Toronto's law school in 1971. He practised criminal law for 17 years before being appointed a judge in 1990. He was named to the court of appeal in 2005.

The other Jewish Supreme Court justices are Morris Fish of Quebec, Marshall Rothstein of Manitoba and Rosalie Abella of Ontario.

Libyan Jew Leaves

TRIPOLI — A Libyan Jewish exile who tried to restore Tripoli's main synagogue left the country after angry protests. David Gerbi, who arrived in Libya from Italy this past summer when strongman Moammar Ghadafi was ousted by rebels, agreed to return to Rome on a military transport Oct.11. On Erev Yom Kippur, hundreds of protesters called for his deportation and carried signs reading, "There is no place for the Jews in Libya." They tried to remove Gerbi from his hotel but were stopped by security. He began trying to clean up the Dar al-Bishi synagogue earlier this month but was forced to leave by armed men. Gerbi, who fled Libya at age 12 in 1967, said he'd spent weeks getting permission from Libya's new leaders to clean up the site.

Groundbreaking held for new synagogue

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Some 500 people celebrated the Oct. 9 groundbreaking for a new synagogue on Toronto's Spadina Road.

The new building will replicate the facade of the Great Synagogue in Jaslo, Poland, which was built in 1905 and destroyed by the Nazis in 1939. It will serve the Temmy Latner Forest Hill Jewish Centre, currently housed above a coffee shop at 446 Spadina Rd.

The 11-year-old modern Orthodox congregation, with more than 200 member families, has "a real energy," according to Rabbi Joel Wardinger, its executive director and an early member.

Congregants are mostly young families, but there are also multi-generational families and "a real singles scene," Rabbi Wardinger told The CJN.

The new building, designed by architect Wayne Swadron, will be located at 360 Spadina, just south of Heath Street.

It will be 27,000 square feet and will include a Holocaust memorial room and rooftop garden terrace, which will be used for weddings.

A chronology of captivity

These words were written some 72 hours before the scheduled release of Gilad Schalit from his five years and four months of captivity in Gaza.

Last week, on the eve of the festival of Sukkot, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu electrified the Jewish world with the news that a tentative agreement had been reached with Hamas, through Egyptian and German brokerage, to exchange 1,027 Palestinians in Israeli prisons for the 25-year-old Israeli.

And like all sudden surges of electricity, the announcement both jolted and energized.

Everyone was happy for the young man and his long-suffering family. But even in their happiness, some people opposed the agreement, contending that the price Israel paid to secure Gilad's freedom was too high. Others, on the other hand, countered by saying no price was too high if it meant bringing home one of Israel's soldiers alive and well. (Please see the editorial in this edition of The CJN.)

From the editor's desk...

The debate about the "price" was undoubtedly joined last week during Sukkot in synagogues around the world, from the pulpit and in the pews, around the table during festive meals and in the quieter moments of evening conversation.

We now look to the imminent future hoping that young Gilad returns whole to his family and to the further horizon, hoping that the Jewish state will have paid only once for his release.

But before we cast our eyes and our hopes forward, it is fitting to again look back in time to recall some of the events during Gilad's captivity that defined the unique agony that only his parents and immediate family knew. Five and a half years seem now to have elapsed in time's typical blur. How utterly untrue that was for Gilad and his family. The following is an abridged chronology from an article published by Ha'aretz.

• On June 25, 2006, Palestinian terrorists from Gaza raid an IDF base in southern Israel. They kill two soldiers, wound Gilad Schalit and kidnap him to a hideout somewhere in Gaza.

• In December 2006, Gilad's father, Noam, publishes a letter to his son in the Palestinian newspaper Al-Quds, which is printed in Jerusalem. The letter says: "Our son Gilad, stay strong, don't break."

• In January 2007, senior Hamas officials say there has been significant progress in contacts on a prisoner swap, involving then-Egyptian intelligence chief Omar Suleiman. But the talks ultimately fail.

• In June 2007, on the first anniversary of Gilad's captivity, his kidnappers release an audio tape in which the soldier asks the Israeli government to bring him home.

• In June 2008, on the second anniversary of Gilad's captivity, the Schalit family receives the last of three letters from Gilad, who has not been permitted a visit by the International Red Cross since his capture.

Throughout the entirety of his Hamas captivity, Gilad was never permitted a visit by the Red Cross. In an exclusive interview last year with The CJN, the international humanitarian agency admitted that Hamas' abject frustration of its efforts and its resulting inability to obtain access to the young prisoner constituted a failure by the organization.

• In December 2008, Israel launches Operation Cast Lead in the Gaza Strip. At the end of the fighting some three weeks later, the Schalit family receives word via a French mediator that Gilad is still alive.

• In March 2009, to mark Gilad's 1,000th day in captivity, the Schalit family moves into a protest tent opposite the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem. The government, headed by Ehud Olmert, again fails to reach a deal, despite last-ditch efforts. Gilad's third year in captivity passes with no prospects for his release.

• In October 2009, Hamas releases a video in which Gilad appears and addresses his family and the prime minister.

• In April 2010, Noam Schalit sends a personal message to Hamas political leader Khaled Meshal asking him to approve Israel's latest offer.

• In June 2010, four years following their son's kidnapping the Schalit family embarks on a march from their home in Mitzpe Hila to Jerusalem. Thousands of people accompany them. Netanyahu, says that "Israel is willing to pay a heavy price for Gilad Schalit's release. But it cannot say: 'At any price.' That is the truth and I'm saying it here."

• In June 2011, Gilad has spent five years as a prisoner held by Hamas.

• On Oct. 11, Netanyahu surprises the public by announcing an agreement for Gilad's release is at hand and that Gilad "will be home in a matter of days."

If, by the time these words are read, Gilad Schalit is safely back at his home in Mitzpe Hila, he will have spent 1,941 days in captivity. May this day, therefore, indeed be the first day of the rest of his life.

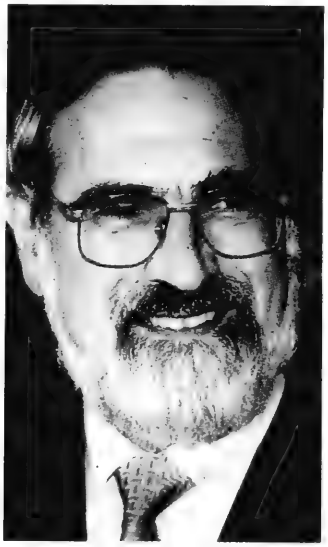
British chief rabbi to speak in Toronto

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, the chief rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of the Commonwealth, believes that Judaism no longer makes sense to many Jews, and much of his work addresses that issue.

In a phone interview from London last week, the 63-year-old rabbi – who will be speaking in Toronto Nov. 2 and 3 at two Torah in Motion programs – said that in his lifetime, he has seen the gap between Judaism and secular culture grow progressively wider.



Rabbi Jonathan Sacks

"In the 19th century, any Englishman would have understood the first thing you do is you get up in the morning and you pray to God, you keep the Sabbath holy, and all that kind of thing. I think a lot of that is gone from our public culture, so Jews who are engaging with the wider world have to traverse an enormous distance for Judaism to speak to them."

He sees the situation as "a good challenge, because it means we are forced out of our comfort zone. We have to explain Judaism to people for whom it is not second nature… and that's a very creative challenge."

Specifically, he mentioned "kids who use Facebook and watch YouTube, and somehow or other, I have to find ways of communicating with them."

In addition to his own presence on Facebook and YouTube, Rabbi Sacks' other outreach efforts have included a pre-Rosh Hashanah BBC television program, four CDs and a booklet called Letters to the Next Generation, which was distributed in British synagogues on Yom Kippur two years ago.

For Yom Kippur of this year, he wrote Letters to the Next Generation 2, an e-book that is downloadable from his website, chiefrabbi.org, addressing Jewish issues in the form of letters to two fictional university students.

"It's a way of talking gently to people about the big issues," he said of his approach in the booklet. The comment would also sum up the approach he appears to favour in general, given his tone of voice and choice of words throughout the interview.

In light of his upcoming retirement in 2013, Rabbi Sacks said he has been working "much harder." He has been chief rabbi since 1991.

From a religious standpoint, he believes "exciting times" lie ahead, because of the current economic difficulties and political uncertainty. "In such an environment, people look for ways of strengthening their spirituality," he said. "I think we have a great deal to say to the public at large."

His interfaith efforts have included receptions at his home, which he hosted with his wife, Elaine, "for the leaders of the Muslim community to get to know the leaders of the Jewish community."

Despite what he terms "very small groups of radicals" in the Muslim community in Britain, Rabbi Sacks said that "by and large, the Muslim community think of the Jewish community as a good role model for integration without assimilation."

Within the Jewish community, his efforts have also included new prayerbooks, most recently a Rosh Hashanah machzor by Koren publishers with commentary by the chief rabbi.

He denies that they are competing with ArtScroll prayerbooks, which have a more right-wing bent. "I'm a great admirer of Artscroll," he said.

However, he noted, "I think in every generation you need new commentary."

The new machzor and his work in general reflect "Judaism that engages with the world," he said. "You'll find in my commentaries references to Michelangelo, Leonardo da Vinci and Shakespeare."

Rabbi Sacks will be the keynote speaker at Torah in Motion's program Nov. 2 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, in conversation with Elliott Malamet. The following evening, he will appear at the University of Toronto's Isabel Bader Theatre to discuss "The Future of Religion in a Secular Age" with McGill University philosophy professor Charles Taylor. Details about both programs can be found at torahinmotion.org.

Judy Feld Carr with 700-year-old Bible

Carr recalls rescue of Damascus Crown

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

There wasn't a dry eye in the room when Toronto's Judy Feld Carr – who rescued Syrian Jewry – told a packed audience at Israel's national library about how she got a 700-year-old Bible out of Damascus and eventually brought it to Jerusalem.

"This is where my baby belonged," Feld Carr told The CJN, resting her hand over the glass case containing the precious manuscript. "Its history is the history of the Jewish people."

The Bible that Feld Carr saved is one of 11 books known collectively as the Damascus Crowns. The term "crown" is used to describe particularly important biblical manuscripts.

These manuscripts were brought to Israel in clandestine operations. They date back 700 to 1,000 years. Although they were not written in Syria, they are known as the Damascus Crowns because they were held in synagogues in the city over the centuries.

On Oct. 5, the Israeli national library offered the public a rare glimpse of three of the books from the collection. The books had been on display once before more than a decade ago – also for just a few hours.

"I can't get over the fact that all these people came to see the keter [crown] that sat in my house in Toronto," Feld Carr told The CJN.

The library staff underestimated the number of people who wanted to attend the rare public display. Excitement was in the air as people jostled for seats and rubbed shoulders while trying to catch a glimpse of these holy manuscripts.

"I have goose bumps just knowing that the keter is on public display," exclaimed one woman.

A man said: "I am so excited. My grandfather was from Damascus. I just can't believe it."

The manuscripts were written in the Middle East and Europe. They boast beautiful penmanship and illustrations in gold leaf and ink.

"It's time that the people of Israel saw the magnificent pieces from Syria," Feld Carr told The CJN.

In addition to showing the manuscripts to the public, the event also included a symposium on the importance of these books. The highlight was a public interview by Israel Television's Oren Nahari with Feld Carr on her role in rescuing the manuscript.

As Feld Carr spoke, the audience of more than 500 people – many with Syrian heritage – choked up. After all, many of the people sitting in front of her owed her their lives.

Feld Carr, who has been named to the Order of Canada, told of how she smuggled and ransomed Jews out of Syria. "We were buying Jews, one by one, from a hostile government. It was the best-kept secret in the Jewish world," she said.

It was in 1993, on a visit to the national library in Jerusalem, that Feld Carr heard about the Damascus Crowns. A library guide had said there was one crown that had not been seen for 500 years. At that moment, Feld Carr told the audience, she decided she would bring it to Israel.

Knowing the books were considered of extreme importance to the Jews, the Syrian government forbade their export out of the country. Yitzhak Rabin's government set up a hush-hush operation to save the world's most ancient Bibles.

The 'weakness' that is a strength

It is our fervent hope that when these words are read, Gilad Schalit will be safely back at his home in the Galilee with his family, recovering and healing from some 1,941 days as a prisoner of the Hamas rulers of Gaza. Wounded and kidnapped from Israel on June 25, 2006, the young Israeli was to be returned to the Jewish state on Oct. 18, 2011.

Last week, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced that an agreement for Schalit's release had been reached with his Hamas captors. It stipulated that 1,027 Palestinians were to be set free from Israeli jails for Schalit's freedom.

The news was greeted with widespread, but not ubiquitous, celebration in Israel. Indeed, three members of the Israeli cabinet voted against the agreement, because they felt the terms for Schalit's release were not acceptable. It was too steep a price for the small, besieged Jewish state to pay, the legislators said. Many Israelis agreed with them.

The Palestinians who were to be set free in exchange for Schalit included more than 280 serving life sentences for masterminding or participating in terrorist operations against Israelis. More than 100 of these were unrepentant terrorists serving multiple life sentences for mass murder.

Those opposed to the price suggest that the wildly disproportionate number of Palestinians set free will constitute an incentive for further kidnappings. In truth, however, Palestinian terrorists have never ceased their low, craven attempts to kidnap Israelis, soldiers and civilians.

Those opposed to the terms of the exchange also suggest that many, if not most, of the newly released terrorists will simply be let loose once again to perpetrate their murder and mayhem. There may be some truth in this. But the Israeli security and defence establishment is in any event stalwartly engaged in thwarting acts of terror.

Finally, they suggest – as do Israel's enemies, ironically – that the 1,027-for-one exchange lays bare once again, for all to see, the Jewish state's Achilles heel, its core weakness, namely its overarching, paramount concern for the lives of its people.

Alas, there is no denying the truth in this.

The fact that the sanctity of human life is the pre-eminent value of the Jewish state is indeed a military weakness. But it is also the moral greatness of the tiny state and its core inspiration. The entirety of the country's national ethos – including the standing orders of the army's commanders – mobilizes to save life, to build society, to nurture generations for science, industry and the betterment of humanity, to show to its own people and to the world that choosing life always demonstrates the better way and the greater moral strength and toughness.

Reaction to Schalit's impending release

Like all Israelis, I was excited about receiving the news of the impending freedom of Gilad Schalit, who was kidnapped by Hamas in 2006. The news spread quickly on the bus on which I was travelling with a group of fellow tour guides. I was very surprised by some of the comments of some of the guides, especially those who have served in the Israel Defence Forces. They were concerned. They were upset that the price for Schalit's release, the release of some 1,000 Palestinian prisoners, would encourage more attempts to kidnap our soldiers. I just listened. All of us here prayed for the safe release of Schalit. I am not one to ever comment on what price we should pay. I have walked past the Schalit family tent outside the prime minister's home many times. I probably would have done exactly what the Schalit family did for the release of their son. I pray that our government knows what it is doing. More than 1,000 former prisoners, many with our fresh blood on their hands, may be walking the streets again. It is very scary.

Transnistria tragedy largely unknown

As a Transnistria survivor, I have made a commitment to myself to remind people about the tragedy of the Holocaust in Romania. The summer of 2011 marked 70 years since the barbaric pogroms in Romania, and October 2011 marks 70 years since the beginning of the deportations to Transnistria.

Transnistria, a 16,000-square-mile area between the River Dniester and the River Bug, was geographically the largest killing field in the Holocaust, consisting of several hundred camps (almost every community was a camp), but this tragedy continues to be largely unknown. The murders in Transnistria were committed by starvation, freezing, exhaustion from death marches in which people were herded from one camp to another and back, again and again, and from shooting frenzies.

Wanting to hide the fact that their Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic collaborated with the Nazis, the Soviets did not take any pictures or film the sites of the horrible crimes they found in Transnistria. On the contrary, they were quick to camouflage the many mass graves by building parking lots and parks, and planting orchards and wheat fields on top of the mass graves. Thus, there are no memorials, no tombstones, and no one can know where their loved ones are buried. In places where mass killings and burials took place, the bones of the victims stick out of the ground to this day.

In my 1997 book, Shattered! 50 Years of Silence: History and Voices of the Tragedy in Romania and Transnistria, there are about 60 official documents pertaining to those crimes. This book is currently out of print but can be found at Amazon.ca.

Seeking children of ghetto fighters

The Ghetto Fighters' House Museum in Israel was founded by Holocaust survivors in 1949. Immediately upon its founding, a Friends Association was established in Toronto, whose members met many times with Yitzhak Antek Zuckerman, a deputy commander in the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising and one of the founders of the museum. These friends were the leaders of immigrant benevolent (landsmanschaft) and Holocaust survivor societies in Toronto in the 1950s. They prepared a handwritten memorial book in memory of their communities that were destroyed in the Holocaust and gave it to Yitzhak Zuckerman to keep. More than 50 years have gone by since the memorial book was written and we, the younger generation of the Ghetto Fighters' House Museum staff, would like to meet the sons and daughters of those dear people, to hear about them and to tell them about the development of our museum, the establishment of which their parents contributed to greatly. Mideast conflict defies simplification

Rabbi Ross Singer
Special to The CJN

Israeli President Shimon Peres, centre, accompanied by Chief Sephardi Rabbi Shlomo Moshe Amar, holding the microphone, and Chief Ashkenazi Rabbi Yona Metzger, standing beside Peres, as well as by Muslim, Christian and Druze leaders, visited the vandalized mosque in Tuba-Zangariya last week. "I am appalled by what happened here. Shocked to my core," Peres said. "This isn't just against the law, it goes against the Jewish religion and against morals. Seeing what happened here fills me with shame. We will not accept it. There isn't a single Israeli who isn't ashamed by this."

Ever since my family's move a year ago to a kibbutz in northern Israel, driving by the growing Arab villages and towns that dot the roads of the Galilee has given me an uneasy feeling. I have so little contact with this ever-increasing population. Who are these non-Jewish neighbours of ours? What do they think about us? Can they accept the notion of a Jewish state as long as their political and human rights are protected both de jure and de facto? As I drive past their homes and communities, I want to go talk to them and ask them how they feel.

I have always felt uncomfortable about others telling me what Arabs think. The stereotyping of Arab, Jew, Israeli, and Palestinian that is so common in discussions of our region strikes me as grossly oversimplified. I know first hand that the demonizing of Israel by some of its critics doesn't do justice to the subtlety and complexity of its character and challenges. I suspect the same is true of much of the depiction of the Arabs living among and alongside our people.

A number of times in the past, I have sought out opportunities to hear directly from Palestinians and Arab Israelis. Yet the gaps created by language, culture and reciprocal antagonism make such encounters challenging. In my mind, this mutual isolation only makes the encounter more essential. So when I was given the opportunity recently to visit an Arab village in the Galilee, I jumped at the chance.

Two weeks ago, a mosque in the Arab town of Tuba-Zangariya was torched and vandalized. The perpetrators of this ugliness proclaimed in graffiti that it was done to avenge last month's murder of two residents of Kiryat Arba in Hebron – Asher Palmer and his infant son, Yonatan.

A coalition of Israeli organizations known as Brit Choshech Legaresh (loosely translated as the Pact for Banishing Darkness) organized a protest against this act of arson and asked one of my mentors, Rabbi Yehuda Gilad, to speak at the event.

Rabbi Gilad invited me to accompany him. I was more than pleased to participate, both because I believe strongly in condemning this act apparently done in the name of my religion and people, and because this would be an opportunity to finally interact directly with some of my Arab neighbours.

As we drove toward Tuba-Zangariya, I wondered how its population would react to a Jewish presence so closely after the destruction of their house of worship. At this time of pain, would they be able to distinguish between the Jews who burned their mosque in the name of God and the Jews who saw it as a desecration of God's name? At such a time, what would Israeli Arabs be thinking about their Jewish neighbours?

I quickly learned that among the emotions they were feeling was confusion. Soon after our arrival, one of the representatives of the town shared with us Tuba-Zangariya's history of support for the State of Israel.

He reminded us that Tuba-Zangariya sends young men to serve in the Israel Defence Forces. He told us that the residents proudly named their local sports complex after fallen Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin. He shared with us how in the midst of the intifadah, the town consciously chose to avoid taking part in acts of defiance against the state that other Israeli Arabs organized.

He recalled that in the waning days of the British mandate, commander Yigal Alon came to Tuba-Zangariya and successfully recruited some of its Bedouin villagers to fight in the Palmach. Even before the State of Israel was officially established, its inhabitants were willing to fight on behalf of Zionist forces. So many in the town were perplexed: why, of all places was, Tuba-Zangariya chosen as a target?

Yet highlighting Tuba-Zangariya's patriotism toward Israel, the state to which it belongs, is only one level of the complexity of this story. I witnessed Jews and Arabs meeting in peace and harmony outside a mosque. Earlier that week, the press reported on angry demonstrations in Tuba-Zangariya to protest the torching of their mosque. These demonstrations quickly turned violent. Israeli police officers, trying to disperse demonstrators who were destroying public property and blocking roads, were pelted with rocks. They responded with tear gas.

Two years ago, the Jewish head of the regional council of Tuba-Zangariya, Tzvi Fogel, was shot at in his office, and his car was set on fire. Fogel has just announced his resignation over concern for his life in the wake of the renewed tensions.

My first visit into an Arab village as an Israeli citizen only redoubled my conviction that the complexities of this conflict defy simplifications and generalizations. You don't need to do much more than scratch the surface to see that clichés just don't do justice to the reality of the situation here. And yet when these complexities are overlooked, the world risks demonizing a heroic nation engaged in a valiant struggle to balance survival with morality, and we Israelis risk mistaking our friends for our enemies.

Police arrest two suspects in mosque arson

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A Petah Tikva court ruled Oct. 11 that there was not enough evidence to hold a man accused of setting fire to a mosque in the Galilee village of Tuba-Zangariya earlier this month.

Judge Nitza Maimon-Shashua allowed the police to extend the 18-year-old suspect's remand until Oct. 16 in order to produce new evidence. However, she stipulated that if no new evidence could be produced, the police would be ordered to release the suspect.

The suspect, who was arrested just hours after the attack and reportedly studied at a West Bank yeshiva, was brought before the court for a hearing on his remand where an attorney representing him said his client disavowed any link to the incident.

The mosque in Tuba-Zangariya, a Bedouin town of some 5,500 people two kilometres east of Rosh Pina, was attacked in the early morning hours on Oct. 3. The mosque's interior was seriously damaged and many holy books were destroyed by the blaze.

Police suspect that extreme right-wing Jews carried out the arson as a "price tag" operation, referring to vandalism and revenge actions initiated, usually against Palestinians, after terror attacks or state demolitions in settlements or outposts.

Meanwhile, a second suspect was arrested in connection with the arson.

Few details were released about the second suspect, who reportedly is a resident of the West Bank. He was scheduled to appear Oct. 10 in a Tel Aviv court for a hearing on extending his remand.

Both suspects are suspected of "direct involvement" in the arson attack, Israel police spokesperson Micky Rosenfeld told reporters.

The iron wall still paves the road to peace

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Middle East peace process began on Oct. 24, 1973, 18 days after Israel was caught by surprise by Egyptian and Syrian attacks from the south and north – attacks that scored substantial advances during the first 48 hours of fighting.

But by Oct. 24, when the fighting ceased, the Israel Defence Forces stood 101 kilometres from Cairo and 40 kilometres from Damascus, and the Egyptian Third Army was completely encircled east of the Suez Canal.

Moshe Arens in Jerusalem

It was a terrible war for Israel, and yet, a great victory. What the IDF's victories in 1949, 1956 and again in 1967 had not been able to accomplish was achieved in the Yom Kippur War. Now, Egypt was eager to negotiate a peace treaty with Israel. The Egyptian leadership concluded that Arab armies stood no chance of beating Israel on the battlefield, and the time had come for peace.

It took another four years for negotiations to begin and a further two years for the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty to be signed. The Middle East peace process moves at a glacial pace.

And it was not a warm peace. The Egyptian people were not ready for it, and they're still not ready. But they were prepared to reconcile themselves to the existence of a Jewish state in the Middle East.

Even now that the Israeli Embassy in Cairo has been attacked by wild mobs and the Israeli ambassador has had to leave Egypt, the memories of the Israeli victory in 1973 are still fresh in the Egyptian collective memory, and the treaty signed by Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin and Egyptian president Anwar Sadat in 1979 remains in effect.

Some 50 years before the Yom Kippur War, and more than 20 years before the establishment of the State of Israel, Ze'ev Jabotinsky published the now-famous article The Iron Wall. In it, he explained that there was no reason to expect that the Arabs would greet the Zionist enterprise with open arms or that there was any chance of changing their opposition to the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine by convincing them of the economic benefits it would bring to them.

Their opposition, he explained, was the most natural thing, and, on the contrary, their peaceful acceptance of the Zionist settlers would run counter to all historic precedent.

The fundamental condition for the establishment and security of the Jewish state, he concluded, was the building of an unbreachable "iron wall" that would protect the Zionist enterprise and, in time, convince the Arabs that they did not have the power to breach the barrier and rid themselves of the Jews.

And in what many years later seemed like prophetic words, Jabotinsky concluded: "As long as the Arabs feel that there is the slightest hope of getting rid of us, they will refuse to give up this hope in return for either kind words or for bread and butter, because they are not a rabble, but a living people.

"And a living people yields in matters of such a vital nature only when there is no longer any hope of getting rid of us, because they can make no breach in the iron wall. Not till then will they drop their extremist leaders, whose watchword is 'Never!' And the leadership will pass to the moderate groups, who will approach us with a proposal that we should both agree to mutual concessions."

'Memories of the Israeli victory in 1973 are still fresh in the Egyptian collective memory'

Much has changed since these words were written. An "iron wall" has been built and reinforced over the years. Peace treaties have been signed with Egypt and Jordan. Rockets, terror and the Iranian nuclear threat have appeared on the scene, and in the hearts of many Arabs, the hope still lingers that the Jews can be driven into the sea. Those who today are calling for cuts in the defence budget might do well to reread Jabotinsky's article. It's the "iron wall" that paves the road to peace in the Middle East.

Yair Lootsteen will return.

The Palestinian zero-sum trap

When Mahmoud Abbas, the head of the PLO and the Palestinian Authority, put the case for Palestinian independence before the United Nations on Sept. 23, he did so without seeking peace with or for Israel. His speech and other official statements, including an opinion piece in the New York Times on May 16, reflected what academic analysts of conflict and negotiation refer to as a "zero sum" approach.

This rigid framework is the opposite of peace based on flexible and innovative "win-win" solutions. In the latter, conflicts are resolved through compromise and co-operation, so that the lives of the people on both sides are made better and shared interests become the glue that keeps the peace. Under the umbrella of win-win, responsibility for bitter and painful conflict is shared, as are the burdens and costs of peace-making.

In contrast, and despite decades of intense peace efforts, negotiations and dialogue on conflict resolution, the Palestinian leadership and most of Palestinian society remain firmly entrenched in the zero-sum trap.

In the UN and their other speeches, Abbas and others make no mention of compromise, of Palestinian concessions to Israel on Jerusalem, the mythical refugee "right of return" or other ways of meeting Israel and the Jewish people half way.

Instead, we get the constant repetition of the victimization myths – of wars, suffering and refugees, in which Arab armies and Palestinian terror campaigns are simply erased, while Zionism and Israel are painted as aggressors, attacking innocents without provocation.

Abbas and other Palestinian speakers never mention responsibility for the violent Arab rejection of the original UN two-state partition plan on Nov. 29 1947, followed by the invasion designed to prevent the creation of the Jewish state. Similarly, when Abbas condemns the post-1967 "occupation" and "settlement," he forgets then-Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser's declared goal of driving the Jews into the sea.

In this zero-sum trap, Abbas is following directly in the late Yasser Arafat's well-worn path of Palestinian rejectionism. The clothes and some of the words may be different, but the message is the same. In his UN speech, Abbas referred to Israeli "apartheid policies" and the "construction of the racist annexation Wall." In blindly rejecting a win-win transformation of the conflict, Abbas is simply Arafat in a suit.

While critics of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu would probably argue that the same is true on the Israeli side, the facts show otherwise. Under previous governments, Israel presented peace plans that would have required very difficult concessions, which first Arafat and then Abbas refused. And in his own UN speech, Netanyahu included significant and specific offers of compromise on key issues of borders and settlements.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

At the beginning of the speech, Netanyahu declared: "I extend my hand to the Palestinian people, with whom we seek a just and lasting peace." But the response was a restatement of the Palestinian zero-sum approach.

Stuck in this framework, peace is impossible – it is not on the agenda, and any concessions on one side are seen as victories for the other. A zero-sum worldview, which often reflects a rigid social and religious framework, has no room for different voices and opinions, or for mutual acceptance.

Thus, in order for any positive movement toward peace to be made, it's first necessary to transform the fundamental Palestinian perspective from "zero-sum" to "win-win." As past failures have demonstrated, without this underlying transformation, there's no hope for agreement on specifics such as borders, refugee claims, security measures or economic co-operation.

This transformation means the acceptance of Israel as a Jewish state, as a partner in a peaceful and stable political framework. A "win-win" approach also means listening to the Israeli point of view and understanding Jewish historical links to this land and the history of the conflict, as distinct from insisting on an exclusively Palestinian narrative.

The events of the past few weeks, like those of the previous years and decades, show that we're still very far from this transformation. And as long as the Palestinians cling to a zero-sum approach, there's no realistic opportunity for a serious peace agreement.

Film director Dani Levy makes waves in Germany

It would probably be safe to say that Dani Levy's films are unfamiliar to Canadian movie fans. But to cinephiles in Germany, his name strikes a chord of recognition.

Levy is probably the best-known Jewish film figure in this country since Ernst Lubitsch (Ninotochka and To Be or Not to Be) and Artur Brauner (Europa Europa and Before Sundown).

One of Levy's last films, Mein Fuhrer: The Truly Truest Truth About Adolf Hitler, a rousing farce, created something of a sensation here after its release in 2007. Screened in hundreds of theatres all over Germany, it was No. 1 at the box office for two weeks.

Sheldon Kirshner in Berlin

Since his inaugural movie in 1985, Levy – a former circus clown and acrobat – has directed more than a dozen feature films and shorts, plus a plethora of television movies.

Most of his feature films have been thematically generic. I Was On Mars is about a Polish tourist in the United States who tries to track down an amiable swindler who has relieved her of her money. Silent Night turns on a woman trying to decide which of two men will be her lover.

Three of his films, Life Is Too Long (2010), The Giraffe (1999) and Go For Zucker! (2004), his most popular movie in terms of revenue, have been driven by Jewish themes and characters.

It would not be far-fetched to say that Mein Fuhrer, which might have been unthinkable only a few years ago, is Levy's most controversial film. Set amid the ruins of Berlin in 1944, it is a comedic send-up on the deranged mind of an evil dictator who brought Germany to its knees.

Hitler, portrayed by Helge Schneider, is too depressed to deliver an important speech to the German people. Joseph Goebbels, his propaganda minister, finds a solution. He plucks the fictional Adolf Grunbaum, a Jewish actor imprisoned in a concentration camp, to coach Hitler in public speaking. Grunbaum uses the opportunity to try to kill Hitler. When he fails, he subjects Hitler to a series of humiliating exercises.

In Mein Fuhrer, reality is inverted in the service of comedy. Hitler, in real life, is a compelling orator. But in Levy's alternate universe, he is a bumbler.

As an arch antisemite, Hitler would never have agreed to be coached by a Jew. Yet in Mein Fuhrer, Hitler, depicted as an impotent drug addict who childlessly plays with a toy battleship in a bath, obeys Grunbaum's commands.

"Comedy was the right way to portray Hitler," said Levy in an interview at his office in Berlin's leafy Tiergarten district.

Levy, whose 54th birthday falls on Nov. 17, wanted to be politically incorrect, impertinent, cheeky and subversive.

Alice Miller, a Swiss psychologist who claims that childhood trauma is the cause of criminal behaviour and mental illness, influenced Levy, who was born in Basel, Switzerland. Miller, in a book titled For Your Own Good, argued that Hitler was a product of 19th century and early 20th century German child-rearing practices.

"Children were physically punished, abused and traumatized," said Levy. "This had a psychological effect on Hitler."

Given his own family history, Mein Fuhrer proved to be therapeutic for Levy.

Levy's mother, Lea, now 83, left Berlin under duress, having been smuggled into neutral Switzerland as an illegal refugee in 1939. Ten of her distant relatives were murdered in the Holocaust, but some managed to immigrate to Palestine. She continues to live in Switzerland.

She and her husband, Andrei, a French Jewish doctor from Alsace raised in Switzerland, initially advised Levy not to involve himself in Mein Fuhrer.

"They thought it might not be a good idea. They feared that my reputation as a filmmaker would suffer."

But after watching the final cut, they said were pleased with the film. To Levy's regret, his father died before its official opening.

In retrospect, he calls Mein Fuhrer a cathartic experience. "I finally understood how Germans related to Nazism and Hitler," said Levy, who grew up in a household where the Holocaust was never discussed.

"I'm not obsessed by the Holocaust, but I'm emotionally connected to it. I'm trying to understand how it was possible."

Although Germany commemorates the Holocaust as no other country outside Israel, Levy thinks that Germans have had their fill of it.

"It's not trendy to talk about it today in Germany," he claimed. "Germans are overfed by it, maybe sick and tired of it. Germany is in the process of unloading its guilt. Germans don't want to be seen solely as perpetrators. They also want to be perceived as victims. Germany was ruthlessly bombed during the war and its women were raped en masse."

But Germany cannot delete the Holocaust from its history, he added. "It'll be here forever."

As Levy recalls, his career in film was accidental. "We didn't have a TV at home. I was not one of those early movie freaks. My goal was to be a stage director."

From the age of 11 to 14, he worked in a children's circus as a clown and acrobat. Then a theatre in Basel hired him as an intern. In 1980, he joined the Rote Grutze, a Berlin theatre troupe. It was an ironic development. "I grew up in Basel quite anti-German," he said.

These days, he feels ambivalent living in Germany.

"It's a free, liberal country. Democracy is functioning. There are no fascists like [Jean-Marie] Le Pen [a French far right and nationalist politician] in Germany. I have full confidence in Germany, and Berlin is a great city. I have a German wife, and I get along with Germans. I feel very comfortable living in Germany, but Jewishness in Germany is not 100 per cent welcomed, and Jews are still something exotic in this country."

Deep down, Levy is afraid that "the old German mentality, which likes heroes and heroic stories, might come back."

Dani Levy

Levy's personal life is an open book.

For about a decade, he lived with the German actress, screenwriter and director Maria Schrader, who starred in a few of his films, as well as in Aimee and Jaguar, a 1999 film about a German Jewish woman who goes into hiding in Nazi-era Berlin.

Levy and his wife, Sabine, a makeup artist and documentary filmmaker, have been married for 11 years. They have two children, Hannah, 11, and Joshua, 5, and reside in Berlin's sedate Charlottenburg district. He is not officially affiliated with the Jewish community.

Levy – a partner in X Filme Creative Pool – is currently working on his next film, the tentative title of which is The Little Dictator. He plans to shoot it next summer.

"It's a family comedy about nut cases. The characters are depressed, schizophrenic, lonely and dysfunctional. It's a very Jewish film. My take on the world is extremely Jewish."

He is also writing a screenplay about the Ritchie Boys, a legendary U.S. military intelligence unit in World War II composed primarily composed of German Jewish refugees.

It's truly a topic right up his alley.

Rooftop garden terrace planned for new shul

Rabbi Elie Karfunkel, spiritual leader of the congregation, said the rooftop plans tie in with the Jewish custom of getting married under the sky, being "green-friendly," and are also appropriate for an urban synagogue with a limited amount of land.

A $12-million campaign is underway to raise money for the building, to be called the Glassman Jaslo Complex in honour of Max and Gianna Glassman. The Max and Gianna Glassman Foundation, the Albert and Temmy Latner Foundation, and the Joseph and Faye Tanenbaum Foundation are the main supporters of the project.

Construction is expected to begin this winter.

Speaking at the groundbreaking, Joe Oliver, MP for Eglinton-Lawrence and Canada's minister of natural resources, said the event was "a testament to the spiritual strength, religious commitment and dynamism of the Jewish community of Toronto and the energy and vision of the Karfunkels."

Other speakers included MPP Eric Hoskins, city councillor Joe Mihevc, and former solicitor general Robert Kaplan, the father of John Kaplan, a construction chair of the project.

Oliver said the new building would represent "the improbable survival and continuity of the Jewish tradition against near overwhelming forces of unspeakable evil."

"There was great Jewish life going on in Europe before the Holocaust," Rabbi Karfunkel told The CJN. "We wanted to honour those people with a profound message that not only are they not forgotten but that the spirit of Judaism didn't die."

The idea for the replica came from the rabbi's wife, Rifky. No one in the congregation has a personal connection with the town of Jaslo, but it represents "all the shtetls that had such rich Jewish lives," Rabbi Karfunkel said. Its synagogue was "the centre of Jewish life."

FAMILY MATH: Grade 3 student Maya Mammon and her mom, Rachel, were among more than 400 students and their parents who took part in a recent family math night at Associated Hebrew Schools' Kamin Education Centre in Thornhill. Students from junior kindergarten to Grade 5 and their parents rotated through a series of hands-on math activities that were developed and supervised by teachers at the school.

Carr used own network

"It was one of the most important operations we participated in," said Eliyahu Hasson, chairman of the community of Damascus Jews in Israel, who served as director general of the Transportation Ministry at the time.

Instead of joining forces with the official secret operation, Feld Carr used her own network to get the Damascus Crown.

"Out of all the things I have done in my life, this operation was the most brilliant," she says.

Feld Carr apologizes that she cannot reveal the full story of the operation, but says that she sent a contact to Damascus to get the book from the community's rabbi. "One day, I would love to tell who it was. He was a Catholic. He was a wonderful man and he died last year," she says.

Feld Carr says her contact smuggled the manuscript out of the country hidden under his raincoat in a black shopping bag.

She took it to a Tunisian rabbi in Toronto to certify its authenticity. She said he "burst into tears and said, 'Get this book out of my house. I feel like I have just seen God.'"

Feld Carr says the biblical manuscript, which was likely written in Italy, had two records of purchase on it – one showed it had been sold in Spain before Jews were expelled from the country in 1492, and the other showed a sale in the Ottoman Empire.

"It went from Italy to Castille, to Constantinople, to Damascus, and then to Toronto, this book was the story of the Jewish people," she said.

The audience gave Feld Carr a standing ovation. The symposium's speakers all praised her work. Asked by The CJN to describe herself, she said: "I'm an ordinary person who cared a lot. I grew up in Sudbury, the daughter of a fur trader. Nothing goes together. I have never been inside Syria, and I will never be inside Syria. I figured out how the system works. I believe things in life are bashert. You are picked to do things. I was chosen to do this."

Reversing the Israeli public relations disaster

Murray Teitel
Special to The CJN

Feature

Israel is vilified throughout the world. Its efforts to counter this image have generally made things even worse. If Israel's army were as effective as its hasbarah ("public relations," but literally, "explaining"), it would have long ago been wiped out by its enemies.

But something can be done. The situation can be turned around.

The first step is to understand what is wrong with the present approach. Currently, Israel counters accusations by explaining why it had to do what it did and engaging in rational argument.

When will Israel get it? They don't care. Anyone capable of or interested in thinking critically is unlikely to be anti-Israel to begin with. The average mind becomes glued to obscene but effective catch phrases like "Israeli apartheid."

Forget hasbarah: Israel should fight PR wars just as it fights military wars. When Israel is attacked, the Israel Defence Forces never just reacts defensively, remaining on Israeli soil, but always takes the battle to the enemy where it is vulnerable, where it can learn that there is a price to pay for attacking Israel.

This approach is a natural fit because Israel's critics are all morally worse than she is. Let's look at how this would work in the real world.

Turkey's prime minister is one of Israel's most determined critics. He used his Sept. 22 speech at the United Nations to trash Israel and demand an apology and compensation to Turkish families for nine armed "activists" killed when Israel intercepted the Gaza-bound flotilla last year.

Rather than let it pass, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu might have devoted two minutes of his speech the next day to saying: "It surprises me that Prime Minister Erdogan complains about Israel killing Turks. Turkey kills nine unarmed Turkish civilians every week – most of them Kurdish separatists. Can this assembly imagine a civilized country like Canada extra-judicially murdering its separatists?"

Netanyahu could have gone on to point out that on Aug. 21, a Turkish warplane wiped out an entire family of Kurdish farmers, including four children and two women. Turkey committed genocide against 1.5 million Armenians during World War I. Not only has Turkey never apologized, Turks who even mention the event are prosecuted under Article 301 of its penal code – for the crime of insulting the Turkish nation, no less.

He might have concluded: "Little wonder that Prime Minister Erdogan has 68 journalists in prison – more than anyone else in the world. Even more than his esteemed colleague, President [Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad."

Newspapers would have loved it, turning out headlines like "Netanyahu offers to apologize for nine Turks if Erdogan will apologize for 1.5 million Armenians" and "Israel will compensate families of nine activists if Turkey will compensate families of 9,000 Kurds."

As long as Turkey's human-rights atrocities are front and centre, its application for admission to the European Union will continue to be rejected. It will find its anti-Israel policy too costly.

The fact is that all Israel's detractors are evil. Jimmy Carter, in his book Palestine: Peace not Apartheid, claimed that Israel is worse than South Africa. Carter does not want it known that he himself should be tried in The Hague for war crimes committed when he increased arms shipments to Indonesia for the purpose of enabling the genocide of 1/3 of the population of East Timor.

Sanctimonious, superior Sweden? Swedish iron ore produced the armaments that enabled Nazi Germany to conquer Europe. German iron was of low quality and needed to be mixed with higher grade ore. Sweden, though officially neutral, happily supplied all the ore the Nazis needed as long as it could make money. Grand Admiral Erich Raeder, head of the German navy, declared that it would be "utterly impossible to make war should the navy not be able to secure the supplies of iron ore from Sweden."

They only stopped when it was obvious Germany was finished and Sweden began to fear Allied retaliation. Sweden has on its hands the blood of everyone killed by German arms during World War II.

Western anti-Israel activists, for the most part, don't consider themselves antisemitic, but they behave like antisemites by singling out Israel, little realizing that to Palestinians, they are the useful idiots: valued for the damage they do to Israel but otherwise held in contempt.

Instead of handing them media wins that encourage them to engage in ever-more provocative tactics, Israel could exploit their activities to strategic advantage in the PR war.

For instance, Israel's navy, followed by television crews, could surround the next Gaza Flotilla and offer to escort it to Syrian territorial waters, directing its passengers to a town that could really use their token aid after months of shelling by their own President Bashar Assad's forces.

Or it could escort them instead to Turkey's maritime border to deliver aid to Kurds whose villages have been destroyed by the Turkish armed forces.

Israel is surrounded by countries and non-countries each more violent than the next. They discard their corrupt dictators and descend to even greater depths of barbarism, as demonstrated by the recent attack on the Israeli Embassy in Cairo. A mob howling for blood torched the embassy. Police and armed forces refused to intervene. Field Marshall Mohammed Tantawi, head of the Supreme Military Council ruling Egypt, refused to take calls from Netanyahu or the United States. (The similarity to the November 1918 pogroms with which Poles celebrated their independence was no doubt unintended.)

Israel will always have to do bad things in its own defence. Merely explaining its actions, hasbarah, is inadequate and turns Israel into a convenient punching bag. What needs to be tried is an attack-based response to Israel's critics.

Yes, it will lack politeness; it will, however, be effective.

EU is right to think twice about Turkey

Turkey's veiled threats against Cyprus over that country's recent decision to work with a U.S. firm to develop gas fields off the country's southern coast has been the subject of limited media attention.

Surely a focus on Turkey's involvement in Cyprus is long overdue.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In 1974, under the pretext of preventing the annexation of Cyprus to mainland Greece, Turkey invaded Cyprus, occupying the northern third of the island. The international community has never recognized that occupation, which came about through aggression. On Nov. 15, 1983, Turkey unilaterally proclaimed the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus, an entity acknowledged by no one else. While the government of the Republic of Cyprus remains the internationally recognized government of the whole island, Turkey refuses to acknowledge it, something the National Post's Peter Goodspeed pointed out in a story last month.

The Turkish invasion forced Greek Cypriots in the north, constituting about half the Greek Cypriot population, to flee to the south. In 1975, a United Nations-sponsored agreement led to a formalized exchange of populations (Turkish Cypriots in the south moved to the north, and most of the remaining Greek Cypriots moved to the south). The UN "Green Line" separating north and south prohibited the return of Greek Cypriots to their former homes in the north.

In 2004, when Cyprus became a member of the European Union, a number of Greek Cypriots, demanding the right to return to the north, took their case to the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR). In a ruling that shocked the Greek Cypriot community (but elicited not a whimper abroad), the ECHR ruled last year against the Greek Cypriots, even though northern Cyprus is not an EU member.

In the court's judgment, too much time has elapsed since the original displacement and too many changes have occurred on the ground to make a "return" feasible. The court also argued that the just remedy is for the complainants to accept compensation for their property if Turkey establishes a fair and equitable means of achieving it.

Much has been written over the past few years about the EU's rebuff to Turkey's application for full membership, including charge that many states in Europe, fearful of the rise of Islam on their soil, are guilty of bigotry – an insult that, in part, motivated Turkey's turn to the east as it seeks leadership within the Islamic world.

Still, there are valid arguments to be made that Turkey has failed to change its behaviour to conform to the criteria the EU stipulates for membership.

One major criterion is respect for the freedom of speech, something Turkey's prime minister, Recep Erdogan, and his Justice and Development (AK) Party have eroded in the past few years by mounting assaults on a free press. Currently, Turkey has more journalists – over 50 – in jail than Iran. Turkish journalists who dare to be critical of government policy face other forms of intimidation, mainly lawsuits (more than 4,000 had been filed as of a few months ago).

Turkey has also failed to provide full rights, including language rights, to its Kurdish minority, comprising about 20 per cent of the total population of 75 million. Among other setbacks for the Kurds, in December 2009, Turkey's Constitutional Court banned the major pro-Kurdish party.

It's no wonder Freedom House has judged Turkey to be only "partly free," rating it a three out of a possible seven on both political rights and civil liberties.

Despite this poor record, the respected Canadian senator Hugh Segal was moved in an opinion piece, "The world needs more Turkey" (National Post, Sept. 19), to commend, without any reservation, Turkey for its "strong, open, deeply rooted and dynamic democracy," which, in his view, qualifies Ankara "handsomely" for EU membership.

Segal writes that as "a modern, secular Islamic democracy," Turkey can serve as a model to the region. Some observers, however, might consider a possible tension or inconsistency between "secular" and "Islamic," and how it could affect the respect for liberal democratic values that membership in the EU requires.

The message between the words

Rabbi Mark Fishman

Rabbinic Reflections

The last portion of the Torah includes one of its more enigmatic phrases: "eish da'at," or the fiery law. The midrash concludes that this phrase is a description of the Torah. The Torah is written with "black fire on white fire."

What exactly does this mean? On the simplest level, black fire refers to the letters of the Torah, the actual words, which are written in the scroll. The white refers to the spaces between the letters.

On another level, the black letters represent thoughts that are intellectual in nature. The white spaces, on the other hand, represent that which goes beyond the world of the intellect. The black letters are limited, limiting and fixed. The white spaces catapult us into the realm of the limitless and the ever-changing, ever-growing. They are the story, the song, the silence. Sometimes I wonder which speaks more powerfully – the black, rationalistic letters or the white, mystical spaces between them.

It is told that Reb Mendele Vorker, and Rav Avreml, the Trisker Magid, were the best of friends. Even after they became the rabbis of different towns, they still kept in touch, because they had made a pact as children to write to each other every week. So every week, there was one special person whose job it was to deliver letters between the two masters.

One Friday morning, after the delivery man had left Vorkov with his rebbe's letter, he was struck with a bizarre, evil urge. He felt compelled to open the letter and read what his master had written to his lifelong friend. He carefully opened the letter, but when he did, he was shocked to see what was on the paper. Nothing! It was completely blank. At first he felt confused, and then he felt hurt and angry. Was this some sort of trick?

He returned to his rebbe's house and told him that he had opened the letter on the way to Trisk. "And what," the rebbe asked him, "did you see?" The man answered that he had found a blank letter.

"Let me explain something," the Vorker said. "Every one of the black letters written in a Sefer Torah is an expression of God's love for His people. But these letters only express the love that can be put into words. But the blank spaces between the letters – this is how God expresses His love for us, which is so great and which bursts forth to such an extent that it cannot possibly be expressed in words.

"Most of the time, I am able to express the feeling of love I have for my friend with words. But at other times, the love I feel for him is so great, so powerful, that it cannot be expressed. At those times, the only way I can tell him how much I love him is with blank spaces."

As we begin the Torah again this year – anew, afresh – let us always remember God's love for His people. Maybe this care will spur us on to show that same love to our own family members, friends and entire community.

Rabbi Mark Fishman is assistant rabbi of Congregation Beth Tikvah Ahavat Shalom Nusach Haori in Montreal.

Kindness

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

The Talmud records an interesting, if strange, controversy between the theological schools of Hillel and Shamai: What should one chant before a bride? Hillel's disciples, compassionate and empathic, suggested the words "O beautiful and graceful bride." Shammai's disciples, stern and inflexible, chose not to stretch the truth. The difference between the two schools was how they regarded the elixir of goodness.

We must be kind because almost everyone we meet is having a hard time. Kindness is a language that even the dumb can speak and the deaf can hear and understand. Perhaps we should be especially kind these cruel days to unkind people – they need it the most.

The considered life is pervaded with small acts of kindness – a letter sent, a call made, a recommendation given, transportation provided, a cake made, a book lent. All of these done without fuss or hesitation.

As computer know-how becomes widespread, most of us are only an e-mail click away. Somehow our sages knew the magic of communication at any level, for they wrote: "If you have nothing to give a friend, console him with words."

Some years ago in Europe, in search of a museum, I lost my way. I stopped and asked directions from two people. The first shouted to tell me that he was too busy to stop jogging. The second insisted on accompanying me to my destination several blocks out of the way.

One doesn't have to accompany a stranger to fulfil the act of kindness. But graciously taking the time to offer guidance seems doable even in the midst of our hectic lives.

Thomas Carlyle (1795-1881) was married to one of the cleverest women in England. She loved her husband dearly. After her death he read this entry in her diary: "Carlyle never praises me. If he says nothing, I have to be content that things are all right."

This British historian and essayist had been living for decades with a woman whose heart hungered and ached for a word of appreciation – a word that this prolific writer of words had never been kind enough to utter.

An elderly Aldous Huxley confessed, "It is a bit embarrassing to have been concerned with the human problems of one's life and at the end have no more words to offer by way of advice than "try to be a little kinder".

Mark Twain wrote that he was able to flourish for two weeks on an unexpected and kind compliment.

Recently a friend mentioned that he owed his love of literature to a gifted high school teacher. I asked if he had ever thanked her, the answer was no. But following our conversation he wrote to her, not sure she was still alive, and received the following reply. "I can't tell you how much your note meant to me. I am now a widow over 80 years old. I am like the last leaf in the fall lingering behind. You will be interested to know that I taught school for 50 years and yours is the first note of appreciation I ever received. It came on a cold, dark morning, and it cheered as nothing has in years."

Kind words are the music of the world.

Selective status for Palestinian refugees

In a landmark speech to a special political committee of the United Nations' General Assembly in 1958, Israeli ambassador Abba Eban described the plight of the Arabs who'd fled Israel shortly after the state was founded.

With the insight, honesty, and dignity that so defined him throughout his diplomatic career, Eban provided historic context to the "Arab refugee problem," explaining to the committee that what was occurring was, in effect, "caused by a war of aggression, launched by the Arab states against Israel in 1947 and 1948."

"Let there be no mistake," he emphasized, "if there had been no war against Israel, with its consequent harvest of bloodshed, misery, panic and flight, there would be no problem of Arab refugees today."

Sadly, Eban's articulation of what was, and is, recognized as the root cause of the "refugee problem" has been complicated even further since the Arab-Israeli conflict of 1967, when Israel again had to defend itself against threatened annihilation. Then, as before, survival brought with it a dispute on how to deal with Arab populations that were designated "refugees" as a direct outcome of the military adventurism of their leaders.

But regardless of its origins, the perpetuation of the "Palestinian as refugee" notion, with its attendant demand of a "right of return" to Israel for every descendant of those who'd been displaced, has been a major stumbling block in all formal Israeli-Palestinian peace initiatives. Although this vision is manifestly untenable, and widely regarded as such, it nonetheless continues to be exploited as a make-or-break condition for any talks to move forward.

Just recently, amid the bluster of his pitch for unilateral Palestinian statehood at the UN, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas deliberately reflected on Resolution 194 as the foundation for reaching "a just solution for Palestinian refugees." Article 11 of this 1948 General Assembly resolution is interpreted by the Palestinians as giving them entitlement to lands within Israel itself, which they'd lost through the vagaries of their wars against the Jewish state.

My View

Lawrence Hart

And as if to further embellish the intransigence of their political position, Palestinian ambassador, Abdullah Abdullah went so far as to declare that if a Palestinian state were to become a reality, not only would Palestinian refugees from Lebanon, Jordan, Egypt, Syria and other Arab countries be denied citizenship in the new entity, but even those currently living in refugee camps within the West Bank and Gaza "will not be considered citizens." Moreover, he declared to the Lebanon Daily Star that "when we have a state accepted by the United Nations, this is not the end of the conflict [but] only a new framework that will change the rules of the game."

On their face, such comments, though outrageous and irresponsible, may be dismissed as merely another opening gambit for future negotiations. But scratch the surface and what's re-exposed is an ominous undertone that endorses the rigid, ideologically driven and ultimately counterproductive manoeuvring on the part of successive Palestinian interlocutors that would sooner doom large numbers of their own people to everlasting refugee status rather than recognize the sovereignty of an Israel that refuses to heel to the existential threat that a Palestinian "right of return" signifies.

Dead Sea vying to be 'new' natural wonder

If you have ever had the chance to float on the Dead Sea supported by its salty waters, you now have the opportunity to return the favour and support the Dead Sea. The unique body of water is a finalist in an international competition to be named as one of the New Seven Wonders of Nature.

By Nov. 11, hundreds of millions of votes will be cast for familiar contenders such as the Amazon, Galapagos, Grand Canyon and Great Barrier Reef, as well as lesser-known wonders such as Vietnam's Halong Bay and Azerbaijan's Mud Volcanoes. Closer to home, the Bay of Fundy, home to the greatest tides in the world, is Canada's lone entry. Just to get a spot on the shortlist, all 28 finalists had to beat more than 400 other contenders. [http://bit.ly/deadsea1]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

This competition is very much a popularity contest in which bids that are more adept at mobilizing public opinion will excel. [http://bit.ly/deadsea5] So how does the Dead Sea compete with formidable natural wonders from around the world? Talk about it:

- Being the lowest place on earth
- Being the saltiest lake, 8.6 times saltier than the ocean
- Having six per cent more oxygen than anywhere else on earth
- Being the world's largest natural spa
- Having a winning combination of history and nature surrounded by ancient ruins, and of course, pillars of salt. [http://bit.ly/deadsea4]

The challengers are taking this competition very seriously. A win means not just bragging rights but free global publicity that could lead to increased tourism. In the case of the Dead Sea, the bid is shared by Jordan, the Palestinian Authority and Israel, whose government has allocated more than $2.5 million to promote its candidate. [http://bit.ly/deadsea3]

The Friends of the Earth Middle East responded that the Israeli bid smacks of "Greenwashing." "We welcome the decision to publicize the choice of the Dead Sea as one of the New Seven Wonders of Nature," the environmental organization said. "But while one arm of government is promoting the global marketing of the Dead Sea, other areas are not concerned about protecting it and are even taking steps that would harm it." [http://bit.ly/deadsea7] The shores of the Dead Sea are dropping by one metre per year and huge sinkholes have been opening up, evidence of a severe water shortage and the growth of chemical extraction industries. [http://bit.ly/deadsea6]

Nevertheless, Dead Sea supporters have been doing their utmost to keep their nominee in the news.

- Earlier this year, 25 of the rescued Chilean miners took some time off to float on the sea's salty waters. [http://bit.ly/deadsea8]
- Ido Tadmor, one of Israel's leading choreographers and dancers, has created a special dance inspired by the sea. "The Dead Sea is my favourite spot in Israel… the place to which I feel the strongest spiritual connection, where I feel purified and cleansed." [http://bit.ly/deadsea9]
- There have also been some unorthodox campaigns to grab headlines. Recently, 1,000 Dead Sea boosters stripped off everything to proclaim their fealty to the natural wonder and to raise awareness of the diminishing water levels of the lake. [http://bit.ly/deadsea10]

Whatever your reason, you can vote for your top seven wonders of nature until Nov. 11. [http://bit.ly/deadsea11]

Max Eisen: a story of courage and gratitude

Eli Rubenstein

My octogenarian friend, Holocaust survivor Max Eisen, maintains a schedule that most people half his age could not keep up with. In a given week, Max can be found speaking to elementary school children, high school and university students, military officers, police officers, Christian and Muslim groups – the list is endless.

But Max's passion is educating young people. Over the past decade, he has crisscrossed the country telling his story to thousands of Canadian high school and university students, and he has participated in 10 March of the Living trips to Poland and Israel. The students sit spellbound as Max shares his story, his wisdom, his insight and the many lessons he hopes they will glean from his experience

Under the auspices of Toronto's Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, Max is one of a group of survivors who has dedicated the latter part of his life to teaching the next generation. They are not only survivors – they are educators, historians, philosophers and, most importantly, imparters of critically important morals and ethics to the next generation.

Max Eisen

I remember being with Max at Queen's University for a March of the Living training weekend for educators. As a Torah was being brought into the conference centre, Max noticed the perplexed students looking at this exotic, unfamiliar object, clothed in velvet, with two wooded circular poles protruding from each end.

Surrounded by professional educators, teachers and rabbis, Max was the only one to speak.

"This is a Torah," he patiently explained to the young students, "the Hebrew Bible, the holiest book of the Jewish people. And it's written on parchment, on scrolls attached to these wooden poles inside. You know, when the Nazis came into Europe, they burned thousands of Torahs, holy scrolls, just like this one. They say, when you first burn books, eventually you will end up burning people. And that's exactly what the Nazis did."

The students began to ask Max questions, and the conversation began – and once again, these students, like thousands of others – were privileged to hear Max's lessons about life.

I, too, have heard Max share his story on numerous occasions. While his story spans eight decades, a few moments among many stand out.

It was the spring of 1944, the first night of Pesach to be exact. Fifteen-year-old Max and his family were celebrating the seder together in his hometown of Moldava (then part of Hungary), singing songs about the delivery of the Children of Israel from slavery to freedom. Hours later, their door was kicked in by Hungarian gendarmes. The family were thrown out of their homes and eventually deported to Auschwitz, where almost all of Max's family and extended family of some 60 souls were murdered.

At this point, Max always reminds the students about how fragile democracy is – in any country. "One moment we were free, singing songs about our liberation. And the next moment, we were in chains, with every single one of our basic human rights brutally taken away from us."

Max also recalls his beloved dog, Farkas (wolf, in Hungarian.) This beautiful Alsatian was Max's most loyal friend. (To this day, Max cannot bring himself to use the term german shepherd, the better known name for the breed.) During the entire process of their expulsion from their homes, the dog barked frantically, understanding something was desperately wrong. It was a bark Max would never forget.

Max was liberated from the Nazi concentration camp of Ebensee on May 6, 1945, (two days before the end of the war) by members of the 761st Tank Battalion, comprised of African-American soldiers in the then-segregated American army.

The troops were shocked by the piles of bodies they saw, and by the condition of the sick and emaciated prisoners, many of them dying in front of their eyes.

"The black soldiers were horrified," Max recalled. "I'll never forget how big their eyes were."

Among the liberators was a young sergeant, Johnnie Stevens, whom Max was reunited with more than five decades later, when Max was finally able to express his gratitude for being given his freedom.

"Without the 761st, I would not be here to tell the story," he would say many times.

After liberation, Max returned to his hometown. His trusted (and sorely missed) canine friend was gone, but not the neighbours who had moved into his home and even refused to offer the frail 16-year-old Auschwitz survivor a glass of water. To this day, Max still thinks about his loyal dog and the contrast to his perfidious neighbours.

But Max almost did not live to see his day of liberation.

Arrived at Auschwitz at age 15

To survive the Holocaust, hundreds of doors had to open up for you, each in a specific order, at a specific time. If one of those doors failed to open – your life was over.

Two such doors opened for Max.

Arriving in Auschwitz-Birkenau when he was only 15 years of age, he was immediately assigned to a work detail, draining swamps in the vicinity of the camp. Unfortunately, on one work detail, an SS officer beat Max unconscious. His fellow prisoners carried the inert boy to the Auschwitz infirmary where his fate was all but sealed. But then a door opened up for Max. Dr. Tadeusz Orzeszko, the kindly Polish doctor in charge of the clinic, took pity on the boy. He saved him from certain death, nursed him back to health and engaged him to be his assistant. What Max did not know was that Orzeszko was also a member of the Polish resistance, carrying on activities even in the heart of this notorious death camp.

One freezing night – on Jan. 18, 1945 – Max and many of his fellow prisoners were forced to march out of Auschwitz, herded by SS guards with dogs and guns. Wearing only wooden clogs and slipping in the snow, many were shot when they could not keep up. Max walked for four or five days without food or water, only managing to pick up a few handfuls of snow for moisture on the way. From time to time, a prisoner would just drop dead, but the guard would dispatch a bullet to the fallen body, just to be sure.

Eventually they were loaded onto open metal boxcars. When they arrived in Plzen in the western Czech Republic, a second door opened. Some kindly Czechs appeared on the overhead bridge, throwing pieces of bread into the open boxcars, but too far away for Max to reach them.

The guards shouted: "Don't throw any bread. These are Jews."

But the Czechs kept on throwing bread until the guards began to shoot at them. For Max, this was one of the most important moments of his life. After all he had been through, to learn that there were still decent people left in the world, this began to restore the boy's faith in the humanity.

"It was like a hand reaching out to me," Max recalled.

Max never forgot the goodness of the people of Plzen, the faces of the men of the 761st battalion and the kindness showed to him by Orzeszko, for whom he felt a debt of gratitude every day of his life.

Max always wondered what happened to Orzeszko, if he had survived the war, and how could he ever repay him. On the 2008 March of the Living, Agnieszka Chrabolowska, a young Polish student on our bus, approached Piotr Cywinski, the director of the Auschwitz-Birkenau Museum, with a request for information on Orzeszko. A few days later, we were faxed a document from the museum containing Orzeszko's testimony, which he had submitted to the authorities in 1946. On the bus in Poland, Max learned that the good doctor had indeed survived the war, and had passed away in 1974 in Radom at 67 years of age.

With the help of Polish Holocaust survivor and hidden child Renata Zajdman, we tracked down Orzeszko's remaining family members, and on a trip with the Simon Wiesenthal Center last year, Max met the members of Orzeszko's family for the first time. They had no idea about the heroic efforts of their father and grandfather in saving Max's life, and were moved to tears to hear about his brave act.

On March 15 this year, Max received a phone call. "It was my 28th birthday," he recalled. "You see, we Jews read from right to left, so that's how 82 becomes 28," he joked.

The call came from Rome, Italy. It was Orzeszko's son, Jan Orzeszko, a retired diplomat for the Polish government, calling to wish him a happy birthday.

Max was grateful, but also a little surprised. Sensing this, Jan said, "I'm calling you on your birthday, because we are all family now." Max could not hold back the tears.

The Nazis were intent on building the Third Reich – a vicious empire that was to last 1,000 years. Their demonic plans have now been consigned to the dustbin of history.

But the courage of the members of the 761st Battalion, the kindness expressed by the people of Plzen and by a brave Polish doctor to a young Jewish boy, live on in the thankful eyes of Max Eisen every time he tells the story.

Our sages teach us that the deeds of the righteous continue to resonate long after their deaths. Our scriptures teach us that love can overcome even death. (Song of Songs, 8:6).

Long into the future, the memory of these events and of one Polish doctor's noble deed will hold a treasured place in the hearts of the family of Max Eisen and of Dr. Orzeszko's descendants – and in the hearts of everyone privileged to hear this story of courage and gratitude.

Eli Rubenstein is national director of March of the Living Canada and founder of the Canadian March of Remembrance and Hope program.

Max Eisen is currently completing a book describing his wartime experiences, which will soon be published.

ישראל הסכימה לשחרר תמורת גלעד 280 אסירי עולם ועוד שבע מאות עם עבירות פחותות, וקרוב לודאי שבכך גם קבעה שלא יהיו יותר אסירי עולם פלסתינאים- כי תמיד אפשר לנסות לחטוף עוד חייל ישראלי.
אבל שישאר בינינו.

Schalit's release will increase danger of terror

Ari Shavit
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

There are many very good reasons to oppose the deal for the release of kidnapped soldier Gilad Schalit. They include the fact that the deal is a surrender by Israel to terror; that it will spur Hamas on and weaken Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and PA Prime Minister Salam Fayyad. It will empower extremists in the Arab world and in Palestine. It will increase the risk of Israeli soldiers being kidnapped in the not-too-distant future. It will increase the danger that a wave of terror will rock Israel.

The deal will strengthen the feeling that sensitivity to human life is Israel's Achilles' heel. The deal will renew the image of Israel as a power encumbered by cobwebs. The deal that saves the life of Gilad Schalit could cost the lives of many Israelis whose names and faces we do not yet know.

And yet, there is one decisive reason to support the deal: Israeli solidarity.

Israel's main asset in human and security terms is the sense of mutual responsibility that its citizens and soldiers feel toward one another.

Without this feeling, there is no meaning to our lives here. Without this feeling, we have neither army, security nor the ability to protect ourselves. Rightly or not, Schalit has become a symbol of mutual responsibility. And therefore his upcoming release will not only be the redemption of a captive and the saving of the life and the return home of a son. Schalit's release will be the realization of Israeli solidarity.

It is unclear what exactly prompted the prime minister and the defence minister to do what they did over the past few weeks regarding Schalit. This exorbitant price could have been paid a year or two years ago. The red lines could have been crossed right after the government came into office.

Apparently Benjamin Netanyahu and Ehud Barak were prompted to act determinedly at this specific time by motives that are not especially gladdening.

The two apparently realized that there will be no diplomatic, economic or social breakthrough here in the coming year. They understood that security could decline in the year to come. They recognized that they are under strategic, political and public siege, and the Schalit front is the only one in which they can chalk up an achievement and engender any kind of hope. And so Netanyahu and Barak stormed the Schalit front, giving it everything they had. Right or not, justified or not, these two former officers of the elite reconnaissance unit conquered their target.

In the coming weeks, Israel will be enveloped in euphoria. The thrilling pictures broadcast from Schalit's home community of Mitzpeh Hila will push out the threatening pictures from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. People will feel that with Schalit's return, we have returned to ourselves. Older people will weep, younger people will celebrate, the social protest will be forgotten.

And yet, the world around us will see things differently. Even our allies will find it difficult to understand us. Sooner or later, Schalit's pictures will be replaced by pictures of others, and so only in a few years will we be able to know who was right at last week's cabinet meeting and who was wrong. Only with time will we know what the proper balance was between what was correct and what was dangerous in the deal to release Schalit.

But until history has its say, we can all rejoice. We will rejoice with Gilad's parents, Noam and Aviva, and with his grandfather, Zvi. We will rejoice with Gilad, the heartbreaking boy Gilad, the son that became a son to all of us, and who is finally returning home.

Hampstead noise bylaw heads to QHRC

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — A Hampstead resident who opposes the town's bylaw prohibiting lawn-mowing and other outdoor noise deemed excessive on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur has complained to the Quebec Human Rights Commission.

The commission confirmed that it had received the complaint, based on the perceived discrimination against those who do not adhere to Judaism, but did not disclose the identity of the plaintiff.

On Yom Kippur, a Saturday, certain residents deliberately defied the regulation, which was adopted more than a year ago, saying they would contest any fine imposed.

The town said it received a few complaints, but it was ascertained that the noise was within any acceptable limit and no infraction was committed.

Hampstead resident Fred Chano, who has been publicly critical of the bylaw and is considering lodging a complaint with the human rights commission, said, "I have received many calls of support in this cause. There will surely be many who are going to try to combat this ridiculous law, which is, in my opinion, very racist toward other religions, above all the majority religion of Quebec."

He made a point of cutting his grass on Yom Kippur.

Constitutional lawyer Julius Grey says Hampstead has probably exceeded its municipal authority in enacting laws based on religion.

A longstanding bylaw in Hampstead bans excessive noise on all statutory holidays. In June 2010, the council amended the regulations to include Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur as well.

At the Oct. 3 council meeting, at least two residents requested extending the bylaw even further, including forbidding use of the dog run on Yom Kippur, in one case, and extending the anti-noise rules to Sukkot, Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah.

Markham Chabad gets over $1M from federal government

Compiled by CJN Staff

The government of Canada last week gave the Canadian Federation of Chabad Lubavitch more than $1 million to build an addition to its Markham Centre for Skills and Independence.

Peter Kent, minister of the environment, announced the funding on behalf of Diane Finley, the minister of human resources and skills development.

The funds will go to help build "a fully accessible addition" to the centre, the government said.

"The new addition, as well as other accessibility improvements, will enable the facility to expand its services for people with disabilities and other members of the community," Kent said.

The money comes from the Ministry of Human Resources and Development's $45-million enabling accessibility fund, which was created in 2007.

Chabad submitted a request for funding during the government's last round of requests for proposals for mid-sized projects, which ran from Oct. 28, 2010, to Jan. 13 this year.

According to the ministry, mid-sized projects eligible for funding include "retrofits, renovations or new construction of facilities within Canada that house services and programs that focus on the social and labour market integration needs of people with disabilities."

$300M expansion planned for Montreal's JGH

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish General Hospital (JGH) in Montreal has been given approval and funding by the Quebec government to undertake its largest-ever expansion of patient-care facilities.

Health Minister Yves Bolduc announced at the JGH Oct. 7 that the government will invest $300 million in the project, which includes the addition of 128 general care beds, as well as new emergency and critical-care departments, among other services, located in a new six-storey tower.

The expansion, which will increase the JGH's available space by 40 per cent, is expected to be completed by the end of 2014.

Bolduc was accompanied by Finance Minister Raymond Bachand, Environment Minister Pierre Arcand, the local MNA for Mont Royal, and Lawrence Bergman, chair of the government caucus, who was credited with persuading the Liberal government to move ahead with the project.

The funds will enable the JGH to complete the three-phase expansion announced in June 2010, for which construction began a year ago. The province provided nearly $94 million for the first phase – a new emergency ward.

The foundation has been poured for the new building, and the ministers were taken on a tour of the massive construction site. An atrium will connect it to the rest of the hospital.

"This ambitious project will have positive repercussions on the environment in which doctors, nurses and other health professionals practise and, of course, improve the quality and accessibility of patient care," said Bolduc, who is a physician.

The new pavilion will include a 53-stretcher emergency department.

There will also be a new surgical unit with 18 operating rooms and a 36-bed intensive-care unit and a coronary unit with 12 beds. A birthing centre will have 15 delivery rooms, as well as 12 beds reserved for women whose pregnancies are high risk. The postpartum unit will have 50 beds and a neonatal unit will care for 40 babies.

In addition, the birthing centre will have two operating theatres for performing caesarean sections, as well as a recovery room.

The upper floors of the pavilion will have four 32-bed care units, each equipped with four isolation rooms. Seventy per cent of the beds will be in private rooms, and the rest will have two beds in them.

The patient floors are the third phase of the project. The pavilion will also include space for such technical support as sterilization, transfusion, respiratory therapy, medical imaging and hemodynamics – observation of blood circulation.

The emergency department is scheduled to open by February or March 2013, said JGH executive director Dr. Hartley Stern.

"These additions will enable the JGH to further improve the quality of its care through higher levels of cleanliness, efficiency and safety," he said. "The newly configured patient rooms will preserve privacy and dignity, while limiting the spread of infection."

Stern said once the project is completed, the JGH will be the best-prepared of any hospital in the region when a pandemic inevitably strikes.

He said the JGH is committed to seeing the project finished on time and on budget, because its agreement with the government is that it will be responsible for any financial overruns. The JGH will also have to pay for a small portion – less than 10 per cent – of the cost of equipping the new facilities, amounting to between $25 and $30 million, he said.

A new ER was the priority, because the current overcrowded department sees about 70,000 patients annually, but was intended to receive only 38,000. While the new facility will be more modern, spacious and efficient, it will have the same number of stretchers as the current one. It should afford patients more dignity, however, because stretchers are to be in individual areas.

Montreal mayor hosts High Holiday reception

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Montreal Mayor Gérald Tremblay welcomed a cross-section of the Jewish community to city hall to toast the New Year and to express appreciation for the community's contributions to the city and its moral values.

It was the first time that Tremblay, now in his 10th year in office, received such a large Jewish group during the High Holidays.

"Montreal, Quebec and Canada would not be what they are without the Jewish community," he said, emphasizing his wish that all of the 120 different cultural groups in the city live in fraternity.

He also officially received the new Israeli consul general in Montreal, Joel Lion.

Tremblay recalled that his association with the Jewish community goes back a long time –50 years, in fact, to when he was 19 and working as a financial analyst for Dun & Bradstreet. Most of his clients were Jewish merchants on St. Lawrence Boulevard.

He was later the member of the National Assembly for Outremont and a cabinet minister, and became well-acquainted with the chassidic communities, whose members were among the guests.

Also speaking at the Oct. 6 event were the chairman of the city's executive committee, Michael Applebaum, and councillor Marvin Rotrand, the majority house leader. Several other executive members and councillors attended.

"The Jewish community has been in Montreal since 1763 and has played a major role in building the city," Rotrand said. "It has left an imprint on what it means to be a Montrealer." He added that he hopes young Jews will stay here.

Rotrand noted that Tremblay is "a friend of Israel" and sensitive to the need to commemorate the Holocaust. Rotrand, the son of survivors, reminded the assembled that every year on Yom Hashoah, Tremblay takes part in a reading of the names of Holocaust victims on the outdoor steps of city hall.

"If Montreal is the economic engine of Quebec, then the Jewish community is an integral part of that engine," Applebaum said.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation lauded the mayor for his defence of diversity and pluralism, and his vigorous denunciation of any form of racism.

Similarly, Federation CJA president David Cape said the community is grateful for the mayor's affirmation that everyone is a Montrealer, whatever their beliefs.

Shul bomber waives right to parole

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The man convicted of arson against two Montreal Jewish institutions in 2006 and 2007 waived his right to early parole last week.

Omar Bulphred, 28, who is serving a seven-year prison term, didn't show up for a scheduled hearing before the National Parole Board Oct. 6.

Bulphred's next statutory release date is set for February, but his parole officers have recommended that his statutory release be revoked because of his hostile behaviour.

Bulphred, with an accomplice, was convicted of throwing a Molotov cocktail at the chassidic Skver yeshiva in September 2006 and of igniting an explosive device outside the Snowdon YM-YWHA in April 2007.

He was sentenced in February 2009. He had 40 months left to serve at that time because his detention since his arrest counted for double time.

Bulphred is incarcerated in the Leclerc Institution in Laval. Earlier this year, he had been released to a halfway house, but was returned to jail after threatening someone at the house. He's also considered a threat to an employee with Correctional Service Canada.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Everyday holiness

Everyday Holiness: The Jewish Spiritual Path of Mussar is a beautiful book that reminds us we need to stay in a holy place not only during the High Holidays, but every day of the year.

Written by Alan Morinis, the book covers the subjects of humility, patience, gratitude, compassion, order, equanimity, honour, simplicity, enthusiasm, silence, generosity, truth, moderation, loving-kindness, responsiblity, trust and faith. It is a guidebook for how to live more spiritually, and it is a guide to live a more meaningful and well-directed life.

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

Recommended by the father of dear friends of ours, Everyday Holiness is full of riches such as this: "Life is a curriculum. Each of us is assigned to master something in our lives. You have already been given your assignment and you have already encountered it, though you may not be aware that what faces you is a curriculum, nor that this is the central task of your life. My purpose is to help you wake up to your personal curriculum and to guide your steps towards mastering it."

So what is your personal curriculum? He talks about how your curriculum shows up in issues that repeatedly challenge you.

"I'm talking about the behaviours that dunk you in the same soup, time and time again. The sooner you become familiar with your curriculum and get on with mastering it, the faster you'll get free of these habitual patterns. Then you will suffer less. Then you will cause less suffering for others. Then you will make the contribution to the world that is your unique and highest potential."

The author suggests we learn about mussar, which is also the simple Hebrew word for "ethics." It is a way of life and a way of living and through studying it, we learn how to "realize our highest spiritual potential, including an everyday experience that is infused with happiness, trust and love."

Imagine waking up every day and feeling elevated, pure and whole? What does it take to achieve that? So many of the answers are contained in this book that states: "When all is said and done, holiness and wholeness and any other elevated idea of the spiritual goal comes down to a simple Yiddish notion: you are supposed to be a mensch, which means "a decent human being."

Morinis talks about how the word mensch really captures the integrity, honour and respect that a person can hope for in his life. Mussar, this path of spiritual self-development, is extraordinary because its goal is not self-help or to gratify all of your desires, but its purpose is to "become the master of your desires so you can fulfil the potential of your higher nature."

It becomes clear that you can't achieve holiness without beginning by being a mensch. Then in order to become holy, what you are really doing is uncovering the holy purity that is already innate within you. Then through introspection and self-examination, you can identify the traits that are hindrances in your life, and are getting in the way.

Some of the ways we can uncover the holy purity is through meditation, silence and retreat, and keeping a mussar diary. The author writes about "bearing the burden of the other," which translates into acts of generosity, loving-kindness and compassion, and care undertaken for the benefit of another.

Says Morinis: "In endeavouring to help others, we will surely encounter our own spiritual curriculum, which provides us with an ideal opportunity to grapple with our own soul traits and to grow spiritually."

Rabbinic college emerges in Germany

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

BERLIN — Historical firsts are nothing new to Abraham Geiger College.

In its original incarnation as the Hochschule fur die Wissenschaft des Judentums, it was the first Reform rabbinical seminary in Germany.

Opened in 1872, it was dedicated to the principle that Judaism could be refreshed, updated and modernized.

One of its principals, Rabbi Abraham Geiger (1810-1874), was a founder of Reform Judaism and a fervent believer in the thesis that Jewish theology and academia could be seamlessly combined.

Closed by the Nazis in 1942, it reopened under its present name in 1999, becoming the first liberal rabbinical seminary in Germany and Europe since the Holocaust.

Like its predecessor, the college – housed on two floors of a non-descript building in central Berlin – integrates Judaic studies with a secular program of education in a rigorous five-year course.

Affiliated with Potsdam University since 2001, it has been a member of the World Union for Progressive Judaism for the past nine years.

The co-founders of the college were two German-born rabbis, Walter Homolka and Walter Jacob, respectively the current rector and president.

One of the first members of its senate, Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut, was for many years the spiritual leader of Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

Starting with only four students in 2001, compared to 23 today, the college ordained its first three rabbis in a ceremony at the New Synagogue in Dresden in September 2006.

This marked the first time a rabbi had been ordained on German soil since the Holocaust.

"Obviously, it [was] a big step forward," Rabbi Homolka was quoted by the Washington Post as saying.

Jascha Nemtso
[S. Kirshner photo]

"It was an unbelievable experience," recalled the college's academic director, Jascha Nemtsov, a 47-year-old Russian-born concert pianist who also heads its cantorial school, which was established in 2007.

Despite the quadrupling of its enrollment after a decade, the student body is still very much international.

While the first three graduates were from Germany, the Czech Republic and South Africa, today's students hail from Germany, Russia, Argentina, Serbia, Israel and the United States, noted Nemtsov, who immigrated to Germany from St. Petersburg in 1994 as a totally secular Jew.

Interestingly enough, two of its students have been converts to Judaism, said Nemtsov. He added that converts must live a fully Jewish life for five years before they are accepted as students.

The college fulfils a deep need. "We have a great hunger for rabbis," the chair of the Jewish Central Council in Germany, Dieter Graumann, was quoted as saying.

Taking such subjects as Jewish history, Hebrew Bible, Talmud and comparative religion, students are instructed by a staff of 21 men and 13 women. "Since we're a small institution, we take a personal approach to each student," said Nemtsov.

Students spend three months in Israel in a traditional yeshiva-style environment, learning Hebrew and perfecting their skills in text study. They are also required to participate in a one-year internship.

As per its requirements, students take a general degree at Potsdam University as they complete their rabbinic studies.

Judging by its mixed gender faculty, the college abhors sexism. One of its recent graduates, Alina Treiger, was the first female rabbi in postwar Germany. (Regina Jonas, the first ever women to be ordained as a rabbi in Germany, was murdered in Auschwitz.)

There are no tuition fees, given the fact that every student is on a scholarship.

At the beginning, the college was funded exclusively by private donors, but today 70 per cent of its budget is provided by the government.

According to its managing director, Tobias Barniske, the college plans to move its physical plant to Potsdam University within the next two years, but plans to maintain its premises in Berlin.

Barniske – the son of a Protestant pastor and a graduate in Jewish studies – personifies the ecumenical spirit of the college. As he put it, "Jews and non-Jews can work together to rebuild."

By contrast, Nemtsov appears to typify the Russian Jewish immigrant struggling to fit into a new society in contemporary Germany.

"It was not my dream to come to Germany," he admitted, saying he and his family intended to immigrate to the United States before discovering they were no longer eligible to do so under its revamped immigration regulations.

"I don't feel at home here," said Nemtsov, who's married to a German Jewish woman. "I'm still a foreigner here. But I feel like at home in the college."

Schulich pledges $100M for new scholarships

JTA

Canadian mining magnate Seymour Schulich has established a $100-million endowment to encourage students in Canada and Israel to study science, technology, engineering and math.

"What I am trying to do in Canada is equivalent to the Rhodes scholarship," Schulich, 71, told the Toronto Star. "I'm trying to emulate my own experience, just like Cecil Rhodes did. It's not so much about science as much as creating leaders."

Once fully implemented in 2014, the program will provide 75 students annually – 60 from Canada and 15 from Israel – with Schulich Leader Scholarships worth $60,000 over four years for each recipient.

Seymour Schulich

Twenty Canadian and five Israeli universities are invited to gather nominations from some 1,600 high schools. Schulich, one of Canada's best-known Jewish business leaders, has chosen the UJA Federation of Toronto to administer the endowment.

Ultimately, the fund will generate $5 million annually, and be indexed to inflation.

"We plan on piloting this initiative for three years," Schulich said. "Science and technology are the principal drivers for a country's economy where education, fuelled by strong math, is essential for national and global economic performance. My hope is that after a successful pilot, this initiative will help ensure Canada and Israel are at the forefront of excellence in science and research for generations to come."

Schulich said he didn't inaugurate the program because he felt Canada needed help against foreign competition. But Israel, he told the Montreal Gazette, is a different story.

"We can't outnumber the Arabs," he said, "so we've got to be smarter than them."

Filmmaker quits awards panel

JTA

Robert Lantos, a prominent Canadian Jewish filmmaker, has quit the jury of a student film awards show over the inclusion of a critic of Israel.

Lantos, who has produced the films Barney's Version and Being Julia, had been asked to judge films at Cinesiege, an annual showcase of student movies from Toronto's York University set to begin Oct. 25.

Lantos resigned in protest after seeing John Greyson's name in the credits of many of the films. Greyson, a filmmaker and York professor, sparked controversy in 2009 when he withdrew his short film from the Toronto International Film Festival to protest the festival's decision to spotlight movies from Tel Aviv.

Greyson also was among the participants in the Canadian Boat to Gaza in July that attempted to break Israel's naval blockade of the Gaza Strip.

Lantos said his decision to quit the jury because of Greyson's involvement was a personal one as a Jew who came to Canada from Hungary, a country that deported thousands of Jews to concentration camps during World War II. In an e-mail to Greyson, Lantos wrote, "I am a Jew, hence I am an Israeli. There is no difference. You are determined to vilify and undermine my people. You have targeted Jews because you think we are vulnerable and because you think you can get away with it in the current climate. About that, you are mistaken."

Israeli chef recalls experience at the front line

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

A few days before the war in Lebanon broke out in 2006, Israeli chef Ido Shapira was getting ready to cater a large party in Tel Aviv. The event was cancelled, but he was left with pounds and pounds of beef.

"There was only one thing to do," he says. "Our soldiers were putting their life on the line, and my partner and I wanted to show our support. We piled everything you can imagine that goes on a hamburger into a truck, bought a big barbecue and drove to a training camp in Haifa."

"We grilled 1,000 burgers for the soldiers, but we weren't the only ones. So many people had the same idea, including grandmas who cooked something every day and drove it to the border, piping hot, never thinking of the danger."

A few weeks after the war ended, Shapira celebrated Rosh Hashanah. He performed the same pre-holiday ritual he does every year. Just before the 10-day High Holidays, he gathers flour, honey, fruits and vegetables, fish and meat, and brings packages to Israelis who can't afford a holiday dinner.

"If you give families the raw ingredients they have the opportunity to recreate recipes just the way they remember them. They will celebrate with their own traditions and retain their dignity," he says.

Although the Days of Awe are a time to rejoice, they are also meant to jolt people and produce a more compassionate response to the plight of others, he adds.

The creative chef feels as much at home cooking typical Israeli dishes as he does creating a more sophisticated cuisine.

"I grew up in Tel Aviv, and my mother, Ruth, always had delicious fruits and vegetables on the table," Shapira says. She would serve a variety of salads including his favourite farm-fresh Israeli salad made with tossed lettuce, pomegranates, leek hearts and pears; a special carrot salad with Middle Eastern herbs; and roasted eggplant with onions, garlic and tomatoes.

"When I eat these dishes, I'm transported back to my childhood," he says.

But even though his mother's homegrown offerings are his comfort food, it was his grandmother's aristocratic cuisine that gave him a sense of culinary adventure. From the time he was five, a favourite activity was hanging out in her kitchen.

An immigrant to Israel from Riga, Latvia, his grandmother, Bertha, arrived with suitcases of splendid belongings, but she also transported memories of the exotic foods she had enjoyed growing up.

"My grandmother made dishes that weren't part of the Israeli table, and used ingredients I had never seen before," Shapira says. "She gave me my love of experimenting." In his holiday offerings he combines both traditions.

The High Holidays are Shapira's favourite time of year.

"Israel is the only country in the world where [Rosh Hashanah is] a national holiday," Shapira says. "Everything comes to a halt, and there's a special feeling in the air. We work very little and spend time with friends and family." To add zing to a dish of acorn squash, he surprised us with oyster mushrooms and sage.

ROASTED ACORN SQUASH WITH WILD MUSHROOMS AND SAGE

2 lb. acorn squash, coarsely chopped
1/2 cup brown sugar
1/2 cup extra virgin olive oil
1 lb. cremini mushrooms
1 lb. oyster mushrooms
salt and pepper to taste
7 sage leaves, coarsely chopped

Preheat oven to 350. In a 9x12 baking dish toss together squash, brown sugar and 2 tbsp. of the oil. Roast until al dente, about 45 minutes. In a separate baking pan, roast mushrooms, salt and pepper with remainder of the oil until golden brown, about 20 minutes. Combine mushrooms and squash, toss with the sage leaves and roast at 200 for 30 minutes longer. Serve warm.

Culinary instructor shares secrets of kitchen confidence

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Elise Burton has only two rules when it comes to cooking: "Don't poison anyone, and try not to set anything on fire – unless it's supposed to be. Everything else is totally acceptable!"

Burton, who started cooking at the age of 12, is a Toronto-based culinary instructor, food writer and recipe developer. When she was in school at Brandeis University, Burton realized she could make extra money by teaching students how to make Shabbat dinner. "I was amazed that people didn't know how to do things like roast a chicken or make a soup. I already knew I loved to cook, but I realized that even more than that, I loved helping people learn to cook."

After graduating, Burton returned to Toronto and held a number of different jobs in the Jewish community, but quickly realized that she missed cooking. "I ended up taking culinary classes at George Brown College, and somehow I found my way into a food writing workshop. When I completed that program I was hired… [by] a food blog and I also wrote for a few different online magazines. I had finally found a career I loved."

Burton was asked to teach a community cooking class at Loblaws and found that she loved cooking for an audience. Soon after she was hired for other classes at the LCBO, Longo's and the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. She is also available for private and corporate classes in people's homes or other private kitchens. "I feel lucky that I have been able to find success doing something I'm so passionate about," said Burton. "I love being in front of a crowd, teaching and entertaining. Most importantly, I pass on the love of cooking."

Burton tries to encourage people not to take cooking so seriously. "Chances are, the mistake you made is not as bad as you think. And if it is, the worst thing that can happen is you have to order pizza for dinner. Move on, and make sure to try again." She also stresses the importance of straying from the traditional ideas of what a meal should be. "One of my favourite weeknight meals is breakfast for dinner. Even people who think they can't cook can cook eggs. Pair a quick omelet with a green salad and you have an easy and healthy dinner in just a few minutes."

Elise Burton

For those without basic culinary skills, or for people who are nervous in the kitchen, Burton suggests taking a cooking class. "For the same price as a movie and popcorn you can learn skills that you'll have for the rest of your life." She encourages people to take a hands-on class instead of a cooking demonstration so they will have the opportunity to try out new equipment and have guidance as they build their confidence. "There is something very empowering about learning to prepare a successful dish."

Burton gets her inspiration for creating new recipes from reading cookbooks, watching The Food Network and by spending time at farmers' markets. She also reworks foods she grew up eating by giving them a contemporary spin.

She tries to cook from scratch as much as she can, but often makes use of convenience products to make her work a little bit easier. "I love things like store bought chicken broth, and no-bake noodles. One of the most versatile products you can buy is a prepared roasted chicken. From that you can make things like chicken salad, pot pie or quesadillas and have meals all week." She also wants to make sure people know that spending more time in the kitchen does not mean they can't still indulge in their favourite guilty pleasures. "Everyone loves going out to eat and you still should – just make it a special occasion rather than a regular occurrence."

In the future Burton would love to expand her audience and have her own television show. In the meantime, for cooking tips and recipes visit her Facebook page, Elise's Cooking Classes, or follow her on Twitter at elisecooks.

Salmon cakes are not ones your mom made

BAKED SALMON CAKES

Forget those old salmon patties your mom used to make – these are nothing like them. Use leftover salmon – poached, grilled, baked; it makes no difference. Serve with a simple lemon aioli and you have a great appetizer, hors d'oeuvre, lunch or dinner. Put them on a tasty roll with butter lettuce, sliced tomato and some of that aioli and you have a killer sandwich.

For the aioli:
1/2 cup mayonnaise
1 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tsp. lemon zest
1 garlic clove, minced
salt and pepper

For the cakes:
12 Ritz-style crackers
1 lb. salmon, cooked, flaked and cooled
1 egg
1/4 cup mayonnaise
4 green onions, finely chopped
1 tbsp. Dijon Mustard
1 tsp. Worcestershire Sauce
3-4 dashes hot sauce
2 tbsp. butter, melted

Aioli

In a small bowl, combine mayonnaise, lemon juice, lemon zest and mince garlic. Season with salt and pepper. Refrigerate until ready to use.

Salmon Cakes

In a food processor, pulse crackers until they are fine crumbs. Transfer crumbs to a small bowl and set aside.

In a large bowl, combine egg, mayo, green onions, Dijon mustard, Worcestershire sauce and hot sauce. Add flaked salmon to bowl with egg mixture and fold to combine. Add in cracker crumbs and continue to fold together. Refrigerate mixture for minimum 10 minutes. While mixture is chilling, preheat oven to 375. Line a baking sheet with parchment paper. Using damp hands, form mixture into cakes. Brush the top of each cake with melted butter. Bake for 20 to 25 minutes until cakes are golden brown.

Makes approximately 8 cakes.

Moshe Basson's Eucalyptus now in Jerusalem

Rosie Schwartz
Special to The CJN

Moshe Basson readies for a performance. His theatre is his eatery, Eucalyptus, a longtime favourite in Jerusalem. He eyes the crowd and then selects an eager participant to accompany him.

Together they will carry out Basson's Ma'aluba ritual as the crowd watches, cheering them on. Aprons are donned and Basson brings out a very large pot and platter. The participant circles his hands above the pot seven times and then lifts it off to reveal a steaming perfectly moulded, aromatic mix of rice and chicken.

Basson has been a performing chef for many years, well before TV chefs became popular. Whether it's a table full of patrons, an entire restaurant, a television program or a large charitable cooking event, he captivates everyone. Not only does he inspire his audiences to cook and savour his creations, he also constantly offers tidbits of the history of the ingredients he uses. His specialty is biblical fare – dishes that were eaten thousands of years ago, many of which have been forgotten in modern times.

But Basson is also Israel's expert on the indigenous food of modern Israel –what grows wild and when and where, as well as how it has been eaten. Mention an herb or an edible plant and he will provide intriguing facts about it. For example, as he presents a dish with a herb called mallow or hubeiza, he tells us of how it was used by Jerusalemites to stay alive during the siege of 1948. On another visit, as we were ready to drive north to the Galil, he instructed us to look for Jerusalem sage, as it was flowering at the time.

The original Eucalyptus dates back to 1988 to the place where Basson had planted a eucalyptus tree on Tu b'Shvat many years before. Since that time, the restaurant has moved a few times, but each time, his fans follow. It seems, however, that he has now found the perfect location: the artist colony of Hutzot Hayotzer at the Sultan's Pools right across from the Old City at Tower of David and the Jaffa Gate.

The artist colony dates back to 1969, not long after the reunification of Jerusalem. It's home to famed studios such as the Engel Gallery and that of Zelig Segal. Stroll down the laneway, and you can glimpse the origins of Judaica pieces known around the world. But be prepared to be tempted to make a purchase – whether it be beautifully designed jewelry made from Roman glass, silver or gold, ceramic pieces, a newly woven tallit or a painting that you may fall in love with.

Chef Moshe Basson

Since Basson opened Eucalyptus in the artists' lane, he has been actively promoting events that would bring visitors to the area. The latest is the 36th annual Jerusalem International Arts and Crafts Fair, which showcased works by more than 150 artists from Israel and around the world this past August. The fair also included theatre, dance and musical performances.

Try to visit Eucalyptus when Basson is on the premises and then put yourself in his hands. Ask questions about what's being served and you'll be treated to both taste sensations and fascinating stories at the same time. Be prepared to spend time to take in the entire experience – you won't want to tear yourself away from either course after course of Basson's creations or his wisdoms. But don't worry. While there may be many plates, this chef knows how to offer amounts to provide a sampling of all of Israel's flavours without making you feel stuffed. For example, while three soups are presented with the tasting menu – biblical lentil, Jerusalem artichoke and tomato mint – each is in an espresso cup to allow for just a taste.

And speaking of stuffed, while many of his specialties such as stuffed figs or sage leaves may be filled with meat or poultry, Basson will provide vegetarian versions if they are requested in advance. But even if there's no advance notice, there are plenty of delicious vegetarian options to choose from – ones that meat eaters will also love. Eggplant preparations, both hot and cold, hummus and couscous may sound ordinary, but they're unlike any others you've tasted. And there are creations such as his green smoked wheat salad that you've likely never come across before.

CHICKEN STUFFED FIGS IN TAMARIND SAUCE

2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
2 medium onions, finely chopped
2 chicken breasts, finely chopped
3/4 tsp. ground cardamom
1 tsp. ground allspice
1 tsp. cinnamon
salt to taste
1 tbsp. tamarind concentrate
2 cups water
2-/2 tbsp. brown sugar
24 fresh figs

In a large skillet, heat the oil over medium heat; add onion and sauté until golden brown, about 10 minutes. Add the chopped chicken breast and cardamom, allspice and cinnamon, and continue to sauté until chicken is cooked through and begins to brown. Turn out into a bowl and cool. In the same skillet, without cleaning it, add the tamarind, sugar and water; stir well and bring to boil. Lower the heat and stir until sauce is smooth, about 5 minutes. Remove from heat.

With fresh figs, make a small incision in the upper part, so it can be closed back after stuffing. With a very small spoon, dig out the flesh and stuff the fig with about 1 tbsp. of the chicken mixture.

Place pot with tamarind sauce back on stove; add figs, bottom side down and bring to a boil. Reduce heat, cover and simmer very gently for 15 minutes.

Serve with rice, couscous or your whole grain of choice. Makes 4-6 servings

Prisoner exchange debated

Avi Issacharoff and Amos Harel

OPINION

In the debate on the prisoner exchange for the release of Gilad Schalit, many Israelis identify with the suffering of the Schalit family and feel a duty to return a captive soldier, while others feel anger over the release of murderers who slaughtered hundreds of Israelis.

Symbolism has also received a lot of attention, but the issue that has been shoved aside in the debate – and it was surely raised in Monday's petitions to the High Court of Justice – is the risk posed by the prisoners being set free.

The last time a possible deal on Schalit came to a head, in December 2009, the chief of the Shin Bet security service at the time, Yuval Diskin, argued that a massive release of terrorists into the West Bank would severely affect Israelis' safety. Meir Dagan, then the head of the Mossad espionage agency, said such a deal, the one on the table, would hand a victory to the "opposition camp" in the Arab world.

But Dagan and Diskin's successors took precisely the opposite stance in the current round of negotiations on Schalit. Mossad head Tamir Pardo told the cabinet last week that Israel was strong enough to deal with the release of 1,000 Arab prisoners.

The current Shin Bet chief, Yoram Cohen, agreed that the defence establishment could handle the risk the releases posed in the West Bank and minimized the importance of the prisoners who were being sent to Gaza.

Cohen's assessment was seconded by a senior Israel Defence Forces officer a few months ago regarding the return of "100 to 150 terrorists to the West Bank." In the end, the number in the deal is 110, including 14 to east Jerusalem. About half those returning to their homes rather than receiving expulsions are from Hamas.

Families of victims murdered in terror attacks pleaded on Monday before the Supreme Court to prevent the release of the Palestinian prisoners as part of the deal for the release of Gilad Schalit. "The blood of the murdered cries out from the ground," the sign at left reads. [Flash90 Photo]

Reserve intelligence officer Ronen Cohen told Ha'aretz, on Sunday, he thought most of the freed Hamas prisoners would be absorbed into the group's political wing.

"Their contribution to terror will be relatively small," he said. "You have to remember that the ones returning to the West Bank are under close security supervision by Israel and the Palestinian Authority."

These assessments are disputed by officials such as Strategic Affairs Minister Moshe Ya'alon, a former IDF chief of staff and former military intelligence chief.

He reminded the cabinet last week that a prisoner swap in 1985 was followed by the murder of 178 Israelis. Defence officials who oppose the current swap warn that the "small fries" among the released security prisoners are actually most likely to revive the terrorist infrastructure, using the knowledge they amassed in prison.

Israeli intelligence officials have also raised the prospect that prisoners denied release could direct a wave of terrorism from their prison cells.

A senior Palestinian security source said it was just a matter of time before another Israeli soldier is abducted in an effort to negotiate the release of the remaining prisoners.

Netanyahu writes to families of victims of Schalit-deal prisoners

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu wrote to family members of the victims of attacks perpetrated by some of the 1,027 prisoners to be released in return for kidnapped soldier Gilad Schalit.

In letters issued Monday, Netanyahu told the families that he understands their "negative feelings" toward the deal because of the death of his brother Jonathan, who was the sole casualty of the 1976 Israeli operation to free hostages at the Entebbe Airport in Uganda.

"In my many deliberations throughout the negotiations, you were always on my mind," he wrote, according to the Prime Minister's Office. "The decision to release Gilad Schalit was one of the most difficult ones I have ever made. It's difficult for me for the same reason it's difficult for you, dear family members."

Dozens of those families and other protesters marched Monday morning to the Supreme Court in Jerusalem, where a three-justice panel convened to hear petitions opposing the deal. The release of the Palestinian prisoners was scheduled to begin Tuesday. Schalit was to gain his freedom the same day.

The petition was filed by the Almagor Terror Victims Association, which asked the court to cancel the prisoner-swap deal. The association also asked the court to delay it to allow more time to study the list and make objections. Several families also have filed separate petitions against the release of particular prisoners.

Schalit's father, Noam, also attended the proceedings and submitted his own response to the petitions, arguing that "any change in its delicate framework could torpedo the entire deal."

The Prime Minister's Office also announced Monday that Gilad Schalit would be promoted to the rank of sergeant-major in time for his release. He was a corporal when he was captured in a cross-border raid in June 2006 and since then has been promoted twice.

Eight new arrests in Claims Conference fraud

JTA

NEW YORK — Eight additional people were arrested in connection with the ongoing investigation into the fraud at the Claims Conference, which now tops $57 million. The Oct. 12 arrests brought the total number of arrests in the case to 30.

Of the eight new suspects named by the U.S. Attorney's Office – Henry Gordin, Genrikh Kolontyrskiy, Viktor Levin, Ella Voskresenskiy, Zlata Blavatnik, Pyotr Blavatnik, Yevgeniya Abramovich and Asya Galindo – five are former Claims Conference employees. A ninth suspect, Lana Kagan, was expected to voluntarily surrender to authorities on Oct. 13, the FBI said.

The suspects are charged with conspiracy to commit mail fraud.

"These defendants had a hand in fabricating, filing or processing nearly five thousand fraudulent claims on behalf of non-qualifying applicants," the U.S. Attorney's Office said in a statement.

"Claims Conference funds have been drained of $57 million meant for Holocaust victims, and a large portion of the diverted money went into the pockets of corrupt insiders."

The inquiry into the fraud at the Claims Conference, which has been carried out cooperatively by Claims Conference officials and the FBI, was discovered in November 2009 but dated back at least to 1993. The investigation has uncovered 3,839 false claims with the Hardship Fund and 1,112 false claims with the Article 2 fund.

Germany created the Hardship Fund to provide one-time payments of approximately $3,500 to Jews who fled the Nazis as they swept through Europe. The Article 2 fund, also funded by Germany, pays monthly pensions of about $400 to victims of Nazi persecution who meet certain criteria related to time spent in a concentration camp and current income levels.

In a recent interview with JTA, Gregory Schneider, executive vice-president of the Claims Conference, said the fraud figure will likely continue to rise until the investigation is concluded and all involved are brought to justice. So far, 626 recipients of payments due to the fraud – most of whom are thought to have participated unwittingly in the scheme – have repaid or agreed to repay the money they were sent, amounting to about $4.7 million. Of that, the Claims Conference has recouped $1.7 million and has agreed to instalment payments for $3 million more.

IDF declares transfer point 'closed military zone'

Many of the prisoners set for release are convicted terrorists who were involved in planning and masterminding attacks that killed numerous Israelis.

Among them are Nasser Yataima, who was sentenced to 29 life sentences for the 2002 bombing of a Netanya hotel on Passover; Yussuf Dhib Hamed Abu Aadi, who was convicted of stabbing Israel Defence Forces soldier Nir Kahana at the Qalandiya checkpoint in 2005 and was sentenced to life in prison, and Nahid Abd al-Rauf al-Fakhuri, who recruited suicide bombers in Hebron and was sentenced to 22 years in jail.

The prisoners to be exchanged are from both the West Bank and Gaza. About half of the prisoners will not be allowed to return to their homes. Some will be deported abroad and the rest will go to Gaza.

Meanwhile, on Sunday, Israel began transferring Palestinian prisoners to jails near their release sites.

Over the weekend, reports from the Middle East indicated that Syria, Turkey and Qatar had all indicated they would accept the deported prisoners.

In anticipation of Schalit's release, on Monday the IDF executed an order that closed off a large swath of southern Israel, including the area around the Ketziot prison, as well as all border crossings into the Gaza Strip, declaring it a "closed military zone."

The order will also apply to the press, in order to prevent the distribution of images of Schalit from the moment he is brought back to Israel until he is reunited with his family. Soldiers guarding the areas through which Schalit was scheduled to be transferred would have their cellphones temporarily confiscated.

Schalit's transfer was to be photographed solely by the IDF's spokesperson unit, as well as the Government Press Office. The edited photographs will be released to the press immediately after Schalit is reunited with his family in the Tel Nof military base in central Israel.

On Saturday, Israeli President Shimon Peres began formally pardoning the prisoners who are part of the exchange. He reportedly will attach a letter to the pardons saying that while he is pardoning the released terrorists, "I do not forget and I do not forgive."

Noam Schalit told Israeli media on Monday that the family had not yet received proof that his son is alive. The last proof came in a one-minute video released by Hamas two years ago. But Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week that Israeli intelligence indicated that Schalit is alive.

After an emergency session last week – in which Israel's cabinet approved the controversial prisoner exchange agreement with Hamas by a vote of 26 to 3 – Netanyahu declared: "Today I bring a proposal to the government for a deal that will bring Gilad Schalit home alive and well."

Schalit's release would mark a remarkable end to a five-year saga that has transfixed the Israeli public, frustrated two successive Israeli governments and spanned two wars.

Almost immediately after his capture, his family launched an incessant public campaign to free him. Schalit's plight struck a chord in the Jewish state and the Jewish world, and Israelis and Jews from all walks of life and political camps took part in activities calling for his release.

News of Schalit's impending release was met with feelings of both joy and trepidation across the Jewish world.

In Ottawa, Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said the development elicited "mixed emotions."

"On one hand, we are excited and relieved by the prospect that Gilad will be reunited with his family. This young man and his parents have suffered the unimaginable. His release not only closes an agonizing chapter in Israel's history, it demonstrates the country's extraordinary commitment to protecting every single life," Fogel said.

Conversely, he said, the release of hundreds of convicted terrorists, "including those who have murdered civilians… is a terribly painful concession on the part of Israel, and we are conscious of just how emotionally taxing it is for Israelis."

In a statement last week, John Baird, Canada's minister of foreign affairs, said he welcomed the release deal. "Canada has consistently called for the release of Gilad Schalit over the course of his imprisonment and hopes that he will soon be reunited with his family after being held in captivity by Hamas for more than five years."

Regarding the timing of the deal, Netanyahu said it was "the best deal we could have at this time." Netanyahu said last week that "storms are sweeping the Middle East," and he did not know if Israel in the near future could secure a better deal "or any deal at all" for Schalit.

The Schalit family last week said it would dismantle its protest tent in Jerusalem once Gilad was home.

"As far as we are concerned, it will only be over when we see Gilad descending the staircase, entering the home. Only then will the circle be closed," Naom Schalit said.

Previous efforts to free Schalit have been frustrated by Hamas demands that Israel release terrorists responsible for some of the deadliest attacks on Israel.

Germany and Egypt had also been attempting to broker a deal.

Thousands of Palestinians in Gaza and the West Bank celebrated news of the deal last week and were preparing a hero's welcome for the released prisoners.

Palestinians regard brethren jailed by Israel as prisoners of war in a struggle for statehood. Israel holds some 6,000 Palestinian prisoners.

Iran to investigate assassination plot

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Iran said Monday that it has asked the United States to provide information about the two people arrested in a plot that Washington linked to Tehran and said was aimed at assassinating the Saudi ambassador to the United States.

Foreign Minister Ali-Akbar Salehi said Iran would investigate the case as well while at the same time accusing the United States of using propoganda methods similar to those employed by Nazi Germany.

"These charges are like propaganda methods used during the Hitler era when they said make the lie big and loud and repeat it over and over again so that even you yourself would eventually believe it," Salehi was quoted by the website of the state television network IRIB as saying. Iran has denied being involved in the alleged assassination plot.

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei

Iran's chief diplomat also warned Saudi Arabia to not follow up on its plan to bring the case to the UN Security Council, warning that the U.S. charges were "aimed at creating political differences in the region."

Meanwhile, the Iranian Foreign Ministry for the second time in a week summoned the Swiss charge d'affaires, whose country represents U.S. interests in Tehran since the two countries severed ties more than three decades ago.

The ministry reiterated that Mansour Arbabsiar, who the United States said was an Iranian agent who was to kill Ambassador Adel A Al-Jubeir in Washington, was in no way linked to Iran's security services. The ministry also demanded the United States extradite the accused agent to Iran's interest section at the Pakistani embassy in Washington.

On Sunday, Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei warned that Tehran would respond robustly to any "inappropriate measure" by western powers linked to the alleged Iranian plot, state television reported.

"Any inappropriate measure against Iran, whether political or security-related, will be strongly confronted by the Iranian nation," Khamenei said, in a clear reference to U.S. allegations that two men with links to Iran's security forces had planned to assassinate the Saudi ambassador to the United States.

Iran says the allegation is without foundation and has been cynically engineered to further isolate Tehran – whose disputed nuclear program has triggered several rounds of international sanctions against it.

In his first reaction to U.S. charges that Iran was involved in the assassination plot, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Sunday that the United States, not Iran, were terrorists.

"The Iranian nation has civilization and culture and does not need to have recourse to terrorism," Ahmadinejad said in a speech to students in Tehran.

"The culture of terrorism belongs to you," the president said in remarks directed at Washington, the official IRNA news agency reported.

Meanwhile, Saudi Arabia has taken a first step to have Iran reported to the UN Security Council, a move that could lead to new sanctions, Saudi-owned newspapers reported on Sunday.

"Saudi Arabia's permanent mission to the United Nations… formally requested the United Nations Secretary General notify the Security Council of the heinous conspiracy," the Asharq al-Awsat newspaper reported, citing a statement from the kingdom's UN mission.

Ahmadinejad said that all the U.S. accusations against Iran were solely futile attempts to deprive Iran of progress and development.

Last week, the United States claimed Iranian agents planned to engage a Mexican drug cartel to assassinate the Saudi Arabian ambassador to the United States, possibly through a bombing at his favourite Washington restaurant.

U.S. President Barack Obama said there was "no dispute" that Iran was involved. "We would not be bringing forward a case unless we knew exactly how to support all the facts contained in the indictment," Obama said.

Supply of kosher meat threatened in Holland

Renee Sanders
Special to The CJN

Depending on the decisions of the Dutch parliament, this year's High Holidays may well be the last in which the Dutch Jewish community was able to consume kosher meat that was ritually slaughtered in the Netherlands. And a public debate about circumcision is next.

What's going on in the Netherlands? In a country known for its freedom and tolerance, freedom of religion seems to be increasingly in jeopardy. There was an upheaval last June in the Dutch Jewish community when the lower house of parliament passed a bill against ritual slaughter. But that upheaval was nothing compared to a more recent one that arose earlier this month when daily newspapers ran an essay by the Royal Dutch Medical Association that discouraged "non-therapeutic circumcision of male minors."

For both the Dutch Muslim community (numbering roughly one million people) and the Dutch Jewish community (numbering 50,000, including some 10,000 Israelis), the furors over ritual slaughter and circumcision have created a precarious situation.

The bill against shchitah (ritual slaughter) was initiated by the only pro-animal party in Europe that focuses entirely on animal rights. This bill, proposed by the Dutch Party for Animals, must still be approved by the senate and the government. The party includes only two of the 150 members in the parliament, but it nevertheless succeeded in convincing a vast majority to vote against ritual slaughter without first stunning the animals.

Prisoner swap with Egypt

Egypt will reportedly release dual American-Israeli citizen Ilan Grapel in a prisoner exchange deal with Israel. The swap will occur after the Israel-Hamas prisoner swap to free captured Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, which was scheduled to take place Tuesday, the Egyptian Ahram online newspaper reported Sunday, citing an unnamed Egyptian security source. Grapel, who Egypt accuses of being a spy, will be released in exchange for 81 Egyptians being held in Israel on charges such as trying to illegally cross into the country, murder, drug trafficking, illegal residency and holding unlicensed weapons, according to Ahram. Three of the Egyptians held are under the age of 14, Ahram reported. Grapel has not yet been indicted, and his detention was extended recently by 45 days. Egyptian security officials said Grapel entered the country shortly after the start of the Jan. 25 uprising that led to the resignation of President Hosni Mubarak and posed as a foreign correspondent. Grapel denies he is a spy. He says he came to Egypt to intern for a non-governmental organization that assists refugees from Sudan and elsewhere. Grapel is a New Yorker who moved to Israel following his graduation from Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore. He joined the Israeli army, served as a paratrooper during the Second Lebanon War and was wounded in southern Lebanon in August 2006.

Aid to the PA

The Israeli general in charge of the West Bank is on the record opposing cuts in U.S. funding to the Palestinian Authority. "Stability in the region includes the ability of the Palestinian Authority to pay its salaries," Brig.-Gen. Nitzan Alon was quoted last week as telling the New York Times. "Reducing the Palestinians' ability to pay decreases security. American aid is relevant to this issue." The United States already has disbursed the $200 million in 2011 funds designated for Palestinian Authority infrastructure, but Republicans and Democrats in Congress are saying they are ready to cut all funds for 2012 because of the Palestinians' UN push for statehood recognition and reconciliation talks with Hamas.

Israeli housing sales head downward as recession looms

Arik Mirovsky and Raz Smolsky
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The construction industry is facing a recession, with moderate drops in new housing prices and a large drop in the number of sales, both new and second hand, figures released by the Finance Ministry last week reveal.

As to what will happen to housing prices in the near future, the general consensus in the industry and among analysts is that prices will continue to fall, but only a little. A Ha'aretz survey of contractors and developers showed they also expect moderate declines in new housing prices. But as a result, developers also say they don't expect to buy new tracts of land for construction in the near future.

The Finance Ministry's monthly evaluation of the Israeli economy and its warning signs, known as the Red Lights Report, showed 6,000 new residential units were sold in August, a 32 per cent drop compared to last year. Preliminary figures from September show the third quarter of the year was the weakest since 2002 for housing sales. This is the continuation of a trend that has been going on for months, as the housing market has taken a downward turn.

The biggest fall in sales is for expensive units, mostly new apartments bought from developers in the centre of the country, the treasury report revealed. The number of deals closed in new projects dropped 47 per cent in August, compared to the same month last year, with the drops in the Tel Aviv and central regions 68 per cent and 55 per cent respectively. Sales of second-hand housing fell 28 per cent, and there was a significant slowdown in sales all over the country, except for the Upper Galilee.

The main reason for the steep drop is a decrease in the number of people buying homes as an investment, the ministry said. Purchases by investors plunged 40 per cent in August compared to the previous year; they were down 22 per cent from July 2011. About 24 per cent of all housing purchases were for investment purposes, said the treasury.

Purchases for investment purposes accounted for a third of all sales in 2009-2010, but new tax regulations encourage investors to sell and make it less attractive to buy for investment purposes. When new regulations take effect in February 2012, the Finance Ministry expects a steep drop in such purchases.

As to which way housing prices will move, buyers' expectations are extremely important. Foreigners have also disappeared from the Israeli housing market, giving hope to homebuyers who expect to see lower prices after five years of steady increases. The recent waves of social protests and the possibility that the state will improve the lot of homebuyers as part of the socio-economic reforms have served to increase hopes for lower prices and more affordable housing.

Parental abduction of children to Russia

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 30 years

On Thursday, 28 July 2011, the Russian Federation deposited its instrument of accession to the Hague Convention of 25 October 1980 on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction. The Convention will enter into force for the Russian Federation on 1 October 2011. This means that for the first time ever, if a parent abducts his or her child to Russia, the parent left behind may be able to successfully apply to a Russian court to have the child returned and do so on a reasonably expedited basis.

Up until now, no Russian court would do so since under Russian law, even a child born in Canada to a Russian parent was deemed to be 'Russian' no matter how old that child may be. In many cases, abducted children would be snatched from their Canadian homes, their schools, friends, relatives and the parent left behind in Ontario.

The typical scenario occurs during a planned vacation when a Russian-born mother announces she is leaving for a brief vacation with a child to visit her family in Moscow or St. Petersburg. Once there the mother (or father) announces that she (or he) is not returning. Moreover, she immediately obtains a court order from a Russian court for custody.

A Canadian lawyer might then obtain a Canadian court order for custody in Canada and an Order for the return of the child, contact the RCMP and even retain a lawyer in the Russian Federation. However, in the past, obtaining such a court Order in Ontario was useless as it would not be enforced by any Russian domestic court since the child would be considered Russian, no matter how many years he or she had lived in Canada, and even if the child was born in Toronto. It was only useful in the event the child ever left Russia since it could be enforced by the international police, INTERPOL.

If an abduction now takes place the parent in Canada should retain a competent Family Law lawyer in Ontario. He or she would then call the Ontario Government at (416) 240-2484 to enforce the Hague Convention Treaty for the international abduction of children. The Ontario Government would contact the Russian Government which would notify the appropriate court in Russia. The lawyer in Ontario would retain a lawyer in Russia to make the court application to return the children in accordance with the Hague Convention and help draft the court documents.

Under the Hague Convention, a parent "left behind" normally only has one year from the date of the abduction to file an application for the return of a child, but there are exceptions to the rule. There are also "defenses" to such an application. For instance, if the child is old enough and insists that he or she does not wish to return to Canada — or if the parent who left with the child can prove that there was violence — the foreign Courts may possibly not enforce the Hague Convention. But these are defenses that do not normally succeed because in international family law such issues should be decided where the child normally resides.

Salaries at state monopolies rival those of doctors, VPs

Avi Bare-Eli and Eran Azran
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Workers at state-controlled monopolies where the Histadrut labour federation reigns supreme earn some of the economy's top salaries, comparable to those earned by doctors and vice-presidents, according to 2010 public-sector salary data disclosed last week by the Finance Ministry.

The report was released after months of social protests over the distribution of public resources. It also came when a protest by hospital interns came to a head after hundreds of medical residents announced a mass resignation.

Some port workers, including navigators and crane operators, cost their employers between NIS 60,000 ($16,800) and NIS 90,000 ($25,200) a month, most of which was their gross salary.

The average salary at the ports increased eight to 14 per cent last year, and average salary costs passed NIS 30,000 ($8,400) a month per worker.

As a whole, port salaries were the highest in the public sector. Second was the Bank of Israel, with total compensation cost of NIS ($7,960).

In comparison, the average wage was NIS 8,900 ($2,500) in July.

In a move that surprised some, protest movement leaders recently announced they would be working with Histadrut chair Ofer Eini to fight the Trajtenberg committee recommendations. Many people perceive Eini as defending workers at state monopolies such as the Israel Electric Corporation, the ports and the Israel Airports Authority, where high salaries come at taxpayers' expense. In addition, Eini is considered a close associate of senior business sector leaders who have been vilified by the protest movement.

So how much did workers at these monopolies earn last year? Here are some striking figures.

Ashdod port navigators earned gross salaries of NIS 71,813 ($20,100) a month, for a NIS 90,077 ($25,200) total wage cost to the Ashdod Port Company. Their counterparts in Haifa port cost their employer a total of NIS 83,440 ($23,360).

A work steward at the Haifa port cost his employer NIS 81,828 ($22,900). General stewards received a comparable sum.

A crane operator at the Ashdod port cost the port company NIS 60,348 ($16,900) a month. And an assistant docking co-ordinator in Haifa received NIS 58,010 ($16,240).

Meanwhile, over at the Israel Airports Authority (IAA), a passenger service representative cost the IAA NIS 67,659 ($18,940)for his monthly salary. Inspectors cost NIS 80,594 ($22,560) a month.

To put things in perspective, vice-presidents for communications and other special roles at government companies cost their employers some NIS 87,580 ($24,520) a month.

In contrast, compensation levels were much lower at other public sector agencies. The average monthly wage at the Magen David Adom emergency medical service organization was NIS 13,194 ($3,700). At the Yad Vashem Holocaust remembrance authority, it was NIS 10,223 ($2,860), while at the prisoner rehabilitation authority it was NIS 8,723 ($2,440).

Israel Film Festival returns with a roster of solid films

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

This year's edition of the Israel Film Festival in Toronto runs from Oct. 23 to 27 and features eight movies.

All screenings are at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Cinemas at 4861 Yonge St. Students are admitted free of charge, subject to availability

A sampler:

Family in Captivity (Monday, Oct. 24, at 6:30 p.m.) is Tal Goren's emotionally wrenching documentary about the captivity of Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit and its repercussions within his family.

[It was made long before last week's sudden announcement that Schalit will be set free under an Israeli prisoner exchange agreement with Hamas.]

Schalit was 19 when he was abducted by Hamas on June 25, 2006, while serving in a post adjacent to the Gaza Strip. Despite Israel's efforts to set him free, he remains a prisoner, languishing somewhere in the depths of Gaza, a young man whom fate has dealt a cruel hand.

Goren focuses on Schalit's grief-stricken parents, Noam and Aviva, who deeply miss their youngest son. "This kind of pain can't be put into words," says Aviva, a dignified woman who never stops thinking of him and constantly worries about his well-being. "It is an open wound that doesn't heal."

Noam, whose brother was killed in the 1973 Yom Kippur War, is more stoic, but his son's incarceration has taken a toll on him. "It seems like an eternity," he muses.

Goren, in this empathetic and moving 56-minute film, covers every aspect of how Schalit's captivity has affected his family.

In one scene, Noam meets with supporters in Israel to plan a public relations campaign to garner interest in and sympathy for Schalit's plight. Then, while visiting the town of Sderot, he is urged by a brash sympathizer to be more assertive.

Noam meets former president of the United States, Jimmy Carter, who has hand-delivered a letter to Hamas on behalf of the Schalit family. "I hope you have your son back soon," says Carter.

As the camera pans to Aviva, she admits to feeling helpless. A bit later, in a speech to well-wishers, she asks for forgiveness for having failed to "protect" her son.

Shortly after moving into a protest tent near the Prime Minister's Residence in Jerusalem, the Schalits fly to New York City. They meet the mayor, Michael Bloomberg, but seem to be dispirited. The cause weighs heavily on their shoulders.

In one of the most pivotal scenes, an Israeli general hands them a Hamas-made video of Schalit. It is the first tangible sign of life from him in years. "It did us good," says Aviva, trying to hold back her tears.

Schalit's older brother, Yoel, also appears in Family in Captivity. Like his parents, he copes with this crisis as courageously as he can, with support from his girlfriend.

The film establishes beyond a doubt that Israelis, in public demonstrations and marches, are fully behind the Schalits. This is a singular family tragedy that has captured the imagination of the Israeli public, along with that of Jews and non-Jews around the world.

In Jorge Gurvich's affecting drama, Mrs. Moskowitz and the Cats (Tuesday, Oct. 25, at 8:30 p.m), romance blooms in the most unexpected of places: the geriatric ward of a hospital.

Yolanda Moskowitz (Rita Zohar), a lonely widow and French teacher living in Tel Aviv, falls down a flight of stairs in her apartment building after trying to silence a brood of meowing cats in the courtyard. She wakes up in a hospital bed, a titanium plate in her hip.

She makes new friends and develops a special attachment to Shaul (Moni Moshonov), a Holocaust survivor from Serbia who once played professional soccer in France but is now dependent on crutches to walk. Like Yolanda, Shaul lives alone, his wife having died and his son having moved to the United States.

For the first time in decades, thanks to Shaul, Yolanda feels like a woman again. But will her feelings remain the same after she is discharged from the hospital?

In virtually every scene, Zohar delivers a virtuoso performance, as does Moshonov, who's extremely effective as a man whose physical decline does not match his mental vigour.

Mrs. Moskowitz and the Cats is a no-frills, down-to-earth movie that touches your emotions.

Guy Nattiv's The Flood (Oct. 23 and Oct. 24 at 8:30 p.m.) is a poignant film about the disintegration of a family.

Poster of Gilad Schalit in Jerusalem

The Roshko household is in frayed condition. Gidi (Tzahi Grad), the breadwinner and a crop duster pilot, may lose his job as a result of his fondness for marijuana. Miri (Ronit Elkabetz), his wife, is having an affair. Yoni (Yoav Rotman), their youngest son, is struggling: though bright, his problem is that he's physically underdeveloped.

Tension builds when Yoni's autistic brother, Tomer (Michael Moshonov), returns home from the institution where he has lived for many years. Tomer's unconventional behaviour irritates Yoni, imperils Miri's daycare business and puts Gidi on edge.

Tempers flare and passions rise as this gentle yet powerful film unfolds. The actors, particularly Rotman, turn in first-rate performances.

In Tzipi Baider's documentary Just the Two of Us (Sunday, Oct. 23, at 6:30 p.m.), the last two survivors of Treblinka visit this death camp in Poland. Kalman Taigman and Samuel Willenberg, both 88 and Israeli citizens, escaped from Treblinka in August 1943 during a prisoners' revolt.

Now, somewhat frail and in wheelchairs, the pair, accompanied by their wives, return to this terrible place, which has been converted into a memorial to the Holocaust.

They start their journey in Warsaw, from which they were deported in October 1942, and stop in the Majdanek concentration camp before proceeding to Treblinka. "We didn't know where we were going," says Taigman, who was separated from his mother in Treblinka. He feels "lousy" in Poland, likening the country to a cemetery.

Willenberg, whose mother was a Russian convert to Judaism, mentions the contrast between Treblinka's pastoral setting and its diabolical function. "I couldn't grasp what was happening," he recalls.

As they walk down a wooded path toward the site, they are beset by a range of emotions. They cry and laugh as they remember the horrors. During the revolt, Taigman says, "The whole camp was on fire."

It's a pleasant surprise when they meet a group of uniformed Israeli soldiers who have been sent to Treblinka to honour them. But Taigman does not consider himself a hero. "I wanted to live," he says simply.

Just the Two of Us is a fine film that could have been better had Taigman and Willenberg described their escape and survival.

Writer converted to Judaism three times

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Circumcise Me! is the story of Yisrael Campbell's quest for spiritual enlightenment.

The writer and star of this one-man show was born a Roman Catholic, but converted to Judaism, not once but three times.

The comedian grew up as Christopher Campbell in Pennsylvania. His father was a Catholic schoolteacher, his mother spent a year as a novice in a convent, and his aunt was a nun for 50 years.

But at the age of 30, Campbell converted to Judaism, first as Reform, then Conservative and finally Orthodox. He has since also made aliyah.

His spiritual journey began as a troubled teenager in Philadelphia when he had an alcohol and drug problem. Part of his recovery was to find a power greater than himself. That sent him on a spiritual seeking path.

"I had always been kind of fascinated by Judaism, but I always thought I wasn't a religious person because Catholicism hadn't spoken to me," says Campbell, whose show comes to Toronto this month.

"So, if Catholicism comes from Judaism, I thought if I don't like the end product, I'm not going to like the source. And yet, I would be fascinated by Jewish stories, chassidic tales, the birth of Israel, the country and Jewish people. I liked being invited to seders."

He decided to check out Judaism, thinking his infatuation with it was blocking him from moving on in his true spiritual path. He took a basic Judaism course, thinking he wouldn't like it more than any other religion, and the exact opposite happened. Campbell fell in love with what he learned and the kind of method of being in a relationship with God.

"So, I pursued the first conversion," he recalls. "At the time, I thought I was converting to Judaism – I would now describe it as my Reform conversion. Then it led to two more conversions and ultimately moving to Israel."

When he first visited Jerusalem, he planned to stay only for a few months but decided to stay the year. It was at that time he met and married his wife, and the two are now parents of four young children.

One day, Campbell was asked to tell his story to a conversion class. The attendees encouraged him to write a book or to turn his story into a one-man show.

Campbell began to develop material around his life story. It started as an hour of standup. The comedian Cory Kahaney suggested they do a one-nighter Off Broadway together. With the help of executive producer Eva Price and director Sam Gold, the standup routine turned into a scripted show with video elements. The show, originally intended to run for eight weeks in November 2009, ran for eight months, ending when the Campbell family, missing Israel, went home.

Campbell says he's proud of how the show turned out and is glad to do it. He feels his humour has always been about why he doesn't fit in and what makes him stand out. He insists the show is not about his finding the truth, as much as he feels it's about his journey and, if anything, he would want to inspire people to go on their own journeys.

Presented by the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, Circumcise Me! runs from Oct. 25 to Nov. 6 at the Jane Mallett Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts. For tickets, call 416-366-7723 or online at www.stlc.com. For more information, visit www.hgjewishtheatre.com.

Diva to perform in Thunder Bay

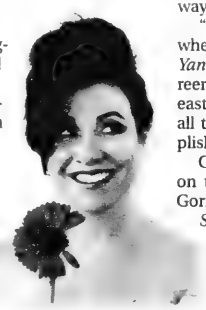
Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

Up until she married actor Beau Gravitte in 1986, famed Broadway musical star Debbie Gravitte was known as "the Jewish girl with the big voice" as famed Broadway producer Hal Prince called her.

Gravitte will showcase her voice in Bravo Broadway featuring the best music on Broadway from Gershwin to Stephen Schwartz in concert with the Thunder Bay Symphony Orchestra Oct. 22 at the Thunder Bay Community Auditorium.

Over her 30-year career, Gravitte was known for 10 years as Debbie Shapiro and was drawing comparisons in her singing range and style to famed Jewish singers Eydie Gorme, Bette Midler and Barbra Streisand.

"Being Jewish in New York always worked to my advantage in getting noticed," Gravitte says in a phone interview from her home in Connecticut. " I was concerned at first when I used my married name, but thank goodness nothing has changed in my career."



Debbie Gravitte

Gravitte earned her big break on Broadway at 25 when she was in the chorus of the original Broadway cast of They're Playing Our Song and never stopped working since. Gravitte went on to lead roles in Chicago, Les Miserables and Zorba among other roles. Gravitte won critical acclaim and fame for winning the 1989 Tony Award as best actress in Jerome Robbins Broadway. For the past decade, Gravitte has traded her role as a great Broadway diva for that of a great Jewish mother, giving up the grind – as she calls it – of eight shows a week on Broadway to select concert tours for a few months per year.

"I have no regrets raising my three children who I wanted to spend much time with," she says. "I did not want to miss any precious moments, like celebrating all the holidays, Jewish and secular with them. It would have been a mistake for me to put show business ahead of my children and husband."

However now that her children are older, she might consider returning. "My children want me to go back to Broadway even if I prefer to be home. They are telling me that they want to see me back on the stage and I hope to go back in a few years."

Born in Los Angeles, Gravitte wanted a career in show business, even as a child singing in the choir at Congregation Magen David. But she was never "star struck" for a career in the movies. Rather, she was attracted to performing on the Broadway stage.

"I admired Gwen Verdon when I saw her in Damned Yankees, and wanted a career on the stage. So. I went east to New York and did all that I wanted to accomplish."

Gravitte also appeared on the big screen as Eydie Gorme in the 2000 film Isn't She Great starring Bette Midler.

"I have been compared to Eydie for many years because of our similar vocal range and styles, so it was fun playing her on screen."

"It was wonderful to go to Israel and, not only sing, but having the opportunity of touring there and exploring my Jewish heritage."

Singer/actress Debbie Gravitte stars in Bravo Broadway in concert with the Thunder Bay Symphony Orchestra Oct. 22 8 PM at the Thunder Bay Community Auditorium, 1 Paul Shaffer Drive. For tickets, call 807-474-2284 or go to www.tbso.ca

Dystopian novel thrusts author onto centre stage

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Gary Shteyngart, the Russian-born Jewish writer who immigrated to America in 1979 at the age of seven, spoke only Russian in his parents' home and did not lose his Russian accent until he was a teenager.

His third novel, Super Sad True Love Story (Random House), from which he is scheduled to read at the International Festival of Authors at Harbourfront on Oct. 22, demonstrates not only how fluid he has become in English but also how fully he has reinvented the language for his own hilarious purposes.

Super Sad True Love Story is a dystopic novel of the near future in which an almost-totalitarian America is ruled by one party, the Bipartisans, featuring a powerful defence secretary named Rubenstein. As the country teeters on the brink of economic collapse, its soldiers are fighting a war with Venezuela and confronting hordes of low-income rioters in the streets of New York.

Advances in technology have made it possible for select people ("HNWI" – High Net Worth Individuals) below a certain age to sidestep the aging process and death; and all citizens carry the remarkable "apparat," which allows them to download information instantly about almost everyone and everything. It's mostly used to provide sexual data on passing strangers.

Our protagonist, Lenny Abramov, is a salesman who works in the Indefinite Life Extension department of PostHuman Services, a company whose main commercial product is immortality; it is headquartered in an old synagogue. At 39, Lenny is possibly already too old to be treated, but his prospects change dramatically after he falls in love with the much younger Korean-American Eunice Park, whose beauty re-invigorates him to the point where he becomes a candidate for extended life.

Super Sad is an epistolary novel filled with Lenny's diary entries and alternating passages of Eunice's lengthy e-mail correspondence with her parents, sister and others. Lenny confides that his dearest wish is "to trick her into aligning her youth with my decrepitude." Although she at first considers him a disgusting middle-aged nerd, she condescends to live with him and – surprise! – falls in love.

Shteyngart's writing is highly satiric and explodes with energy and inventiveness.

The prose is littered with Internet-age acronyms, most too profane to repeat: TIMATOV – "Think I'm About To Openly Vomit" – is one of the milder ones. Techno-neologisms and commercial Internet-speak phrases ("GlobalTeens SuperHint: Switch to Images today! Less words = more fun!") are sprinkled on every page.

Instances of comic nomenclature include Welcome Back Pa'dner, the government's program for citizens returning home from abroad. The airline on which they might return is called UnitedContinentalDeltamerican. There is also a spectrum of vulgar product names. While the novel entertains, some may find that depth of theme and character have been sacrificed on the altar of cheap laughs.

Shteyngart may be compared to numerous writers: Nabokov for the wordplay, Bradbury for the science fiction, Huxley for the dystopic vision, Lawrence Sterne for the epistolary character development, Woody Allen for the humour. (Shteyngart once wrote an essay titled The Mother Tongue Between Two Slices of Rye.)

In his satirical swipes the author targets reading itself, depicting it as a vanishing pastime. He paints a post-literate society in which books are disdained for their awful smell ("like old socks") and anyone seen reading one in public attracts impolite stares. Clearly, books are a thing of the past. "I've never really learned how to read texts," Eunice admits. "Just to scan them for information."

In ironic stories of this type, where humans sink to their most basic, animalistic selves and civilization seems on the verge of dissolution, some sort of remarkable character transformation or redemption is often in the wings. Super Sad makes good on this expectation: as usual, love is the ennobling factor.

Even more than its two predecessors – Absurdistan (2006) and The Russian Debutante's Handbook (2002) - Super Sad True Love Story has thrust Shteyngart onto centre stage in the world of American letters. And that's where he'll be on Oct. 22 (8 p.m.) and again on Oct. 23 (3:30 p.m.), at the International Festival of Authors. Please visit www.readings.org for information and tickets.

When They Come For Us, We'll Be Gone (Houghton Mifflin Harcourt) is American writer Gal Beckerman's riveting account of the epic struggle to save the nearly three million Jews who were languishing in the Soviet Union after World War II, unwanted yet forbidden to leave.

While some Jews trickled out of Russia in the 1970s – including the families of Gary Shteyngart and Toronto author David Bezmozgis – Beckerman shows how the movement to free Soviet Jewry led to a mass exodus in 1989 and forced human rights into the centre of American foreign policy. The book won the National Jewish Book Award in the United States in 2010.

Beckerman, Bezmozgis and Shteyngart are all appearing at the International Festival of Authors. The special track on Russian-Jewish themes is part of the "Koffler at the IFOA" programming presented by the Koffler Centre for the Arts in lieu of a 2011 Jewish Book Fair.

Koffler at the IFOA also includes Peter Filkins, Michal Govrin, Irwin Cotler and others, complementing an already luminous galaxy of Festival literary lights. See www.readings.org for details.

Al Davis was key figure in NFL-AFL merger

Compiled by CJN staff

OAKLAND, Calif. — Al Davis, the maverick owner of the Oakland Raiders, has died.

Davis, who served as coach and general manager of the NFL team and later became its principal owner, died at his home in Oakland, Calif. on Yom Kippur. He was 82.

Davis was born in Massachusetts and grew up in the Flatbush section of Brooklyn. He was inducted into the Pro Football Hall of Fame in 1992.

A colourful and controversial figure, he had been a fixture in professional football for 60 years. He's credited with playing a key role in the merger of the American Football League (AFL) with the National Football League (NFL).

After stints in college football, he began his professional coaching career in 1962 as an assistant with the San Diego Chargers.

He joined the Raiders a year later. Known for their distinctive silver and black uniforms and pirate logo, the Raiders played in 14 AFL or AFC championships, won five AFL and AFC championships and three Super Bowls, (1976, 1980 and 1983). They're one of two teams, along with the Pittsburgh Steelers, to play in Super Bowls in four different decades. Davis gave the team its motto, "Just win baby." The Raiders' mystique was Davis' creation and embodied his rebellious, bad-boy persona.

Under Davis, the Raiders were home to a motley collection of misfits and quirky individuals who also happened to be great players: Ted Hendricks ("the Mad Stork"), Otis Sistrunk ("University of Mars"), Lyle Alzado, John Matuszak and Ken Stabler ("the Snake") among many.

Davis recruited at historically black colleges when such a thing was looked down upon. He gave Bill Walsh, arguably the greatest coach of all time, his first job in pro football. He gave John Madden, the winningest coach of all time, his team. He drafted Howie Long, Art Shell, Marcus Allen, Stabler, Tim Brown, Charles Woodson, Nnamdi Asomugha and Darren McFadden. His emphasis on speed and toughness, his self-cultivated renegade image, and even his leather jackets, Brylcreemed hair and Brooklyn accent made the Raiders arguably the most distinctive, mystique-laden franchise in professional sports.

Davis was also a leader off the field. He was the first owner to hire black and Hispanic head coaches in the NFL (Art Shell and Tom Flores, respectively) and current Raiders CEO, Amy Trask, is the highest-ranking woman in NFL history.

He was involved in several lawsuits against the NFL and had a longtime feud with its late commissioner, Pete Rozelle. Davis won a lawsuit allowing him to move the Raiders to Los Angeles in 1982. He returned the team to the Bay Area 12 years later.

Writing on ESPN LA, sports journalist Steve Springer recalled Davis as an intimidating figure. One story told by Springer went back to 1991. Boris Yeltsin had just become president of Russia, but was faced with a potential coup.

"I was watching practice on the sidelines when Davis came up to me. Staring straight ahead without looking in my direction, he said, 'Yeltsin is going to be all right.'

"What?" I responded, thinking he must be talking about some obscure kicker named Yeltsin.

"'Boris Yeltsin,'" Davis said. "'He's going to be OK. He's got a lot of Jews around him.'"

"Momentarily speechless, feeling like I was in the middle of a Saturday Night Live routine, I finally blurted out, "How do you know this?"

"'I talked to him,'" Davis said. "'I called him last night.'"

"And with that, he walked away, leaving behind a trail of mystery, doubt and disbelief. Just the way he liked it, ever playing his mind games."

Springer, who is also Jewish, wrote that Davis honoured his religious heritage. "Every year on Yom Kippur, the Jewish Day of Atonement, Davis would arrive by limousine at an out-of-way synagogue in time to say Yizkor, a prayer for the dead, leave a generous donation and then disappear back into his limo."

Writing in Tablet magazine, Marc Tracy said Davis revolutionized football's vertical passing game. Back in the late 1960s, when the Raiders became the second AFL team to lose to the Green Bay Packers in the Super Bowl (33-14), they were led by the "mad bomber," quarterback Daryle Lamonica.

"Davis invented the 'bump-and-run' style of pass defence, which is now as elementary to the game as the handoff, and upended the popular understanding of players, who no longer needed to be cogs who fit tidily into predetermined systems but could instead be electric athletes whose improvisational genius enabled their teams to win," Tracy wrote.

In a statement after his death, NFL commissioner Roger Goodell said, "Al Davis' passion for football and his influence on the game were extraordinary. He defined the Raiders and contributed to pro football at every level. The respect he commanded was evident in the way that people listened carefully every time he spoke. He is a true legend of the game whose impact and legacy will forever be part of the NFL."

"Al Davis was unique, a maverick, a giant among giants, a true legend among legends, the brightest star among stars, a hero, a mentor, a friend," the Raiders said in a statement.

By moving his franchise to Los Angeles, Davis established the primacy of owners, paving the way for today, when owning an NFL franchise is a license to print money. He was the very last figure – George Halas of the Chicago Bears and Paul Brown of the Cleveland Browns and Cincinnati Bengals are others – who embodied their team wholly, Tracy wrote.

In his last years, Davis' stubborn insistence on maintaining control was probably in error. The Raiders have failed to make the playoffs since their last Super Bowl appearance in 2002.

Ron Mix, a Hall of Fame offensive lineman, knew Davis when the former was a player and the latter a coach with the San Diego Chargers of the early 1960s. Mix kept up with Davis through the years. Mix, who is Jewish, attributed Davis' me-against-everyone mentality to the climate of antisemitism he experienced and the recent history of the Holocaust.

"I've never seen anyone as loyal as he is to his former players," Mix said. "He's given more jobs to former players in scouting, coaching, front office, than I would bet any other three owners combined. He has secretly helped more former players who have had problems than you can imagine. He is the best friend there is of former players."

Davis is survived by his wife, Carol, and his son, Mark. Raiders chief executive Amy Trask said the team "will remain in the Davis family."

Ovarian cancer survivor raises disease's low profile

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Elana Waldman always dreamed of having a big family, but after giving birth to her daughter she found herself unable to conceive.

Waldman, then 32, began fertility treatments for "unexplained secondary infertility," but nobody thought to pay attention to her family history: her mother had twice survived breast cancer and had tested positive for the BRCA1 mutation, which increases a woman's lifetime risk of getting breast cancer from 17 per cent to 80 per cent and from seven per cent to 40 per cent for ovarian cancer.

During the course of her routine fertility treatments, her doctor found what she thought were cysts – but turned out to be cancerous tumours.

Waldman, now 38, grew up in Montreal and moved to Toronto to attend Osgoode Hall Law School in 1995, going on to practice family law. It was while working as a lawyer that she met her husband on a blind date. They got married in 2002 and had their daughter in 2003.

In August 2005, Waldman was diagnosed with stage 3 ovarian cancer and given a 30 per cent chance of surviving five years.

Elana Waldman

"My cancer was found by accident. That's the problem with ovarian cancer – the symptoms don't present themselves until the disease is advanced so no one thinks about it. There's ignorance in the general medical population regarding ovarian cancer. Even when I was diagnosed, my oncologist said I was too young and that it was probably a border-line tumour," said Waldman.

It was not.

To raise awareness about the disease, Waldman organized events and spoke at different engagements. She started charity events called aWEARnesss, selling donated fashion items at discounted prices, with the money raised going to Princess Margaret Hospital in Toronto. The hospital's research arm, the Ontario Cancer Institute, has an international reputation as a global leader in the fight against cancer. These events raised more than $500,000 in total.

Three years ago, she was approached by a friend of her husband's, Leigh Himel, who had seen a video of Waldman speaking for the Israel Cancer Research Fund and wanted to do something to help raise awareness of the disease. Himel works in digital social media and approached Waldman and her husband, Mark, about starting a project called It's Time To Shout.

This interactive website, which allows women to send in their own stories or the stories of others they know who have had ovarian cancer, aims to educate women about the symptoms of the disease. One of the challenges, as Waldman says in her video on the website, is that "if you're going to interview people who have ovarian cancer, you're much harder pressed to find the survivors to do so.

"There is just a lack of awareness – people don't know the symptoms, and the fact that there is no good diagnostic tool makes it even harder because doctors don't even think about it when you do have the symptoms," she said.

Ovarian cancer is called the "silent killer" because too often there are no symptoms until the disease has progressed to an advanced stage. If diagnosed in stage 1, there is a 90 per cent chance of survival, but the problem is that 90 per cent of cases are caught at a later stage.

Waldman hopes that the video will help women and doctors become more informed about the disease and that the money raised can help fund research to find a proper diagnostic tool, which is a main reason for late diagnosis. "The greatest misconception is that a pap smear can detect ovarian cancer, but it can't," she said.

"That's the shame. People don't know as much about it because it's not as common as the other cancers, but it's more deadly than other types."

Elana Waldman with her husband Mark and daughter Sydney.

More Canadian women die from ovarian cancer than all other gynecologic cancers combined.

Waldman hopes to create something positive from her experience. "If I can turn this into something better, accomplish something, and help make a difference and something positive can come out of this, then that would be great," she said.

She believes that a breakthrough in ovarian cancer research is near. "The research that is going on right now in targeted therapy is unbelievable. Whether it's going to benefit me or the next generation, I don't know but I feel we're on the cusp of something major."

The hardest part for Waldman has not been the physical effects of chemotherapy treatments but the toll the disease takes on her family and, in particular, her daughter, Sydney.

"My daughter told me she hates cancer because it means she doesn't have any brothers and sisters. Not much keeps me up in the middle of the night, but worrying about her – and worrying that I passed down the BRCA mutation to her does," said Waldman.

She hopes women become knowledgeable and become their own best advocates, she said. "We need to make our voices heard, we need to not whisper anymore. I say we need to shout."

Texting replaces talking

Dear Ella,

Either I'm nuts, or everyone else is. OK, so I may be a little older, and maybe I'm not so "with it," but I can't understand how people communicate today.

I had the pleasure of spending the holidays with my daughter's family. I have two bright, wonderful grandsons, 12 and 15. Except for their cellphones, the family functions quite normally, but what I witnessed was very disturbing.

Josh, the 15-year-old was sitting on the couch with his head buried in his iPhone. I thought he was playing a game. Within minutes, his angry brother appeared in the room with an iPad and grudgingly threw it at Josh.

"What was that all about?" I asked.

"I texted him that his time was up and it was my turn," Josh replied. My jaw dropped. He texted his brother, who was in the next room? Why couldn't he get up and get the iPad? The next few days continued in the same manner. Very little talking, but lots of texting.

I see this in the streets too – people walking, standing, driving with their heads down and their thumbs moving on their devices. What happened to communication, to talking face to face and seeing expressions? Has LOL taken over the sound and sight of a real laugh? Is it me, or has the world gone mad?

Talk To Me

Dear Talk To Me,

There's no question that texting has grown steadily in the last few years, and with the addition of full keyboards to most phones, technology has made it very convenient for people to use this as a new primary form of communication.

What texting has essentially accomplished is the elimination of small talk. No need for pleasantries – after all, it's a text message. It's meant to be succinct and quick. You want someone to know you are happy or sad, just add one of those emoticons. No more "How are you?" "What have you been up to?" "Did you hear about the latest?" Who needs to be burdened with unnecessary communication?

Parents are to blame as much as technology. They, too, set this kind of example, and most don't impose boundaries. For example, not using cellphones in the house is a simple rule that would force family members to speak to each other. How about old-fashioned family nights where people actually talk and practise verbal banter?

Our fast-paced society doesn't allow time for everyone to be in the same place at the same time. These kinds of family gatherings have gone the way of the dinosaur and have been replaced by mobile apps, video games and Facebook friends.

What you need to do is force your grandchildren to talk to you. Engage them in conversation. Don't just ask a question like "How's school?" or you will get a one word answer: "Fine." "What did you do today?" will get you, "Stuff." Bring up an interesting subject, maybe sports. Your wanting to talk face to face makes you a minority. You'll need to be creative if you want to break through and get the kids to look up.

HONEY-ORANGE CHICKEN

2 eggs
2 tsps water
1 c breadcrumbs or matzah meal
1 tsp salt
1/8 tsp pepper
2 3 lb chickens cut up
½ c vegetable oil
1 c hot water
¼ c honey
1 c orange juice
2 tbsp grated fresh ginger

Preheat oven to 325° F. Beat eggs with 2 tsp water. In another bowl, mix breadcrumbs with salt and pepper. Dip chicken in egg mixture, then in breadcrumbs. Heat oil in heavy skillet and brown chicken on all sides. Combine 1 c hot water with honey and orange juice. Place chicken in casserole and cover with honey mixture. Add ginger. Cover and simmer in oven 45 min., basting occasionally. Serve with rice.

Musical joy from a retired surgeon

I hear the refrains as I enter the common area on the sixth floor that houses a palliative care and a complex continuing care unit. It's the piano being played by Dr. Irv Koven, a retired surgeon whom I have known for 35 years. He can play anything – jazz, pop classics and good old "oldies" that the patients can hum to and move to in their chairs, in time with the music's rhythm. He always has a smile on his face as he plays.

I met Koven when I became the medical chief resident at Mount Sinai Hospital in 1975. I met him first through the patients he referred for consultation as I began my medical focus on elders. There was not yet a specialty in geriatrics, but when initially recruited, I was given the opportunity to learn on the job by attending to the older patients, including those who were transferred from Baycrest Geriatric Centre for medical or surgical treatment or were applying to go to Baycrest after their Mount Sinai hospitalization.

I learned about Koven's musical talents at the first holiday show I attended during my first year at Mount Sinai. In the show, students, residents and staff physicians brought humour and music to the audience of Mount Sinai staff. I was impressed by Koven's musical virtuosity as he pounded out song after song in a medley of popular classics.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

Over the years that we both worked at the hospital, we shared many elderly patients. I always found Koven extremely sensitive and thoughtful and a fine and considerate surgeon. When I moved my practice primarily to Baycrest and then accepted a major administrative role, I was delighted to discover that he had agreed to be our consultant surgeon there, which meant he attended periodically at our geriatric clinics, thereby helping patients avoid the trip downtown for a consultation or followup after some surgical procedure. I know that the patients and the staff enjoyed working with him because of his warm and engaging manner.

Now, having retired from surgical practice, he continues to bring joy to the patients of Baycrest. Born in Grand Falls, N.B., he started piano lessons as a child and used his musical talents throughout his years of education. While attending high school in Montreal, he was attracted to the special qualities of jazz and added that genre to his popular music repertoire. While studying medicine at Dalhousie in Halifax, he continued playing the piano at parties and other gatherings, making him a very popular guest. This love of music and performing continued through his years of training in surgery at the Beth Israel Hospital in Boston.

He was recruited to Mount Sinai in Toronto, first as a surgical resident, and then on staff as a surgeon. He served there for 51 years, and for 40 of those years, he also had a University of Toronto faculty appointment.

Now retired, he still brings music and joy to patients at Baycrest playing for one hour weekly, and that's where I encounter his always smiling face as he delights patients, many of whom have severe complex illnesses. They are gathered around him and his piano in a large open space between wards bathed in natural light where the gardening program also occurs. Thus, music and greenery become part of the lives of those cared for on the hospital's sixth floor. Koven's contribution to their quality of life is enormous and a tribute to his dedication as a lifelong healer in surgery and through the magic of music.

Netanyahu offers Abbas partial construction freeze

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said he's willing to freeze government construction in West Bank settlements as well as all construction on government land there in return for an agreement by Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to resume direct peace talks.

A senior Israeli official said Monday that Abbas had not yet responded.

The Prime Minister's Office said, however, that Netanyahu did not offer an additional freeze because Israel's position has not changed: it wants an immediate start to direct talks with the Palestinian Authority with no preconditions.

Benjamin Netanyahu

The senior Israeli official said the new proposal was relayed to Abbas on Oct. 19 by Colombian Foreign Minister Maria Angela Holguin, who arrived on a surprise visit to Israel and the Palestinian Authority. She was sent by Colombian President Juan Manuel Santos, who has launched a mediation effort in an attempt to break the deadlock in the peace process.

The mediation offer took shape Oct. 11, when Abbas arrived in Colombia to try to convince the president of Colombia, currently a member of the UN Security Council, to support the PA's bid for full UN membership, a senior Israeli official said.

Before Abbas' visit, Santos contacted U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, proposing that he serve as mediator in view of the close Colombian-Israeli ties and his good relations with Abbas. Clinton gave the effort her blessing.

Santos also spoke to Netanyahu, with whom he had met two weeks earlier on the sidelines of the meeting of the UN General Assembly. Netanyahu said he was ready to co-operate in the Colombian initiative. Although Santos told Abbas he strongly

Premier Visits Israel

HALIFAX — Nova Scotia Premier Darrell Dexter is in Israel and the West Bank this week leading a trade mission. A number of Nova Scotia businesses are taking part in the Oct. 19-26 mission, including Dalhousie University, the Halifax Port Authority and the Brain Repair Centre.

Dexter was to meet with senior Israeli officials, including President Shimon Peres, as well as Palestinian trade officials and Hasan Abu-Libdeh, the Palestinian Authority's minister of national economy. "There are tremendous opportunities in the Middle East for Nova Scotia's high-growth sectors, including information and communications technology, clean technologies and marine and life sciences," Dexter said.

TV Show Scrapped

TORONTO — A reality TV show featuring a character who said she hated "everyone equally – especially Jewish people" won't be aired after a network failed to pick it up, its producers said this month. Lake Shore was billed as Canada's answer to MTV's Jersey Shore. It was to have featured a cast of eight, labelled by ethnic background, including a Jewish woman and one of Turkish descent who made the anti-semitic remark in a promotional video. It led critics to call the show racist.

Tory Areas Favoured

OTTAWA — Shuls and mosques in ridings with Tory MPs had far more requests for federal security funding approved versus those from ridings of opposition MPs, the Ottawa Citizen reported. Only 28 per cent of applications from opposition ridings to the four-year-old, $3-million Communities at Risk Infrastructure Pilot Fund were approved, compared to half of those in Tory ridings.

Most rejected requests came from Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler's Mount Royal district.

Controversial Speakers At Conferences

MONTREAL — Conferences held in Montreal and Toronto by a British-based Muslim group drew criticism from those who believe it espouses antisemitic, anti-feminist and homophobic views.

The Sheraton Toronto Hotel and the Muslim Students Association of Concordia University decided not to provide a venue for the Calling the World Back to Allah conferences following the outcry.

The Islamic Education and Research Academy (IERA) held the meetings at the Islamic Centre of Canada in Mississauga, Ont., Oct. 23 and at a hall next to a Montreal Islamic centre Oct. 21. About 500 people attended each event. The IERA wants to set up a Canadian branch.

In Mississauga, about 30 protesters from the Jewish Defence League rallied outside the gathering. It became heated enough that police had to separate the sides.

In Montreal, the Jewish gay group Ga'ava expressed concern over certain scheduled speakers' "heinous remarks" in the past about Jews and homosexuals.

It asked Immigration Minister Jason Kenney to bar the British Hamza Andreas Tzortzis and Abdur Raheem Green from entering Canada. Tzortzis did speak here.

IERA spokesperson Saleem Chagtai said the group is being unfairly demonized. "We are not responsible for things that [speakers] say out of IERA's venues and conferences," he said. "And in the cases where we have investigated their statements, we've found they were taken grossly out of context."

The Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center and B'nai Brith Canada also warned of the IERA's history of being associated with controversial views.

Newspaper To Close

PORTLAND — An Oregon Jewish paper, the Jewish Review, will close in January after publishing for more than 40 years. The Jewish Federation of Greater Portland said it would save $100,000 by closing the semi-monthly, which it owns, citing the economy and a changing newspaper industry. A new company hopes to publish a monthly Portland Jewish magazine.

Schalit's release celebrated

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

The mood was far more joyous at the Sephardic Kehila Centre Sunday morning than seven months ago, when a rally was held at the Thornhill facility demanding the release of kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

About 200 revellers clutching Israeli and Canadian flags gathered at the hastily arranged event to celebrate Schalit's Oct. 18 release. It was organized by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Members of an Israeli scout troop mingled with politicians and community members to rejoice in the setting free of the young soldier who was kidnapped by Hamas terrorists in June 2006 and held for 1,947 days.

Debate continues around the world on the wisdom of the deal to release Schalit in exchange for more than 1,000 Palestinian prisoners collectively responsible for the deaths of an estimated 569 Israeli civilians.

But addressing the crowd on Sunday, Israel's consul general in Toronto, Amir Gissin, said "no price was too high" to secure Schalit's release.

"We do not give up on our kids – never, ever," Gissin said to applause.

Despite Schalit's frail physical condition, "he stood straight, saluted the prime minister and chief of staff, and showed the dignity of a soldier," Gissin said.

Compare that, he went on, "to the reception of criminals and murderers – bloody murders – had on the other side. It should be said that on the other side, our neighbours are making criminals and murderers their heroes."

Hopes for peace are dimmed, Gissin said, "as long as their society continues to cherish and respect terrorists and killers. "We hope to see in our time a change of values in our neighbours," he said.

Gissin lauded as "a true friend" France's consul general in Toronto, Jerome Cauchard, who attended the rally because the Schalit family holds French citizenship.

In his remarks, Cauchard said France "refused to accept" Schalit's status as a hostage and "took every opportunity to express its refusal." Indeed, Paris bestowed on Schalit the title of Citoyen D'Honeur (Citizen of Honour) around 2008, Cauchard said.

Days of dignity

From the editor's desk...

For the past several years in Jewish communities across the country, the first week in November has been designated as Holocaust Education Week.

The timing of the weeklong series of events is quite deliberate. It is no mere appointment of programs to fill a vacant slot on the calendar post-High Holidays and pre-Chanukah.

Holocaust Education Week usually culminates on or around – or somehow centres upon – Nov. 9. For it was the night of Nov. 9 and the early morning of Nov. 10 in 1938 that became known as Kristallnacht, the Night of Broken Glass.

"Starting in the early hours of 10 November 1938 and continuously until nightfall," Sir Martin Gilbert wrote in the introduction to his book, Kristallnacht (HarperCollins 2006), "violence against the Jews of Germany was unleashed in a whirlwind of destruction. Within a few hours, more than 1,000 synagogues were set on fire and destroyed. Where it was thought that fire might endanger nearby non-Jewish buildings, the rioters smashed the synagogues with hammers and axes. This was no spontaneous outburst of destruction, but a co-ordinated, comprehensive rampage.

"Jews were chased, reviled and beaten up. Tens of thousands of Jewish shops and homes were ransacked. Jews were attacked in every German town... In 24 hours of violence, 91 Jews were killed."

Sir Martin points out in his seminal work that Kristallnacht happened during peacetime. There was, one might say, a "calmer" attitude toward Nazi Germany among many Europeans. World War II would not erupt for 10 more months. Indeed, five weeks earlier, British prime minister Neville Chamberlain had triumphantly declared he had secured "peace in our time" after ceding Sudetenland to Germany.

Still, the xenophobic, antisemitic policies of the German government, the loud, aggressive brutishness of the brown-shirted storm troopers and the loutish clomping of their leather boots upon cobbled stone and human flesh alike had made Hitler's Germany something of a curio for western news services and media outlets. Reporters had flocked to Berlin in large numbers seldom seen in other capitals in Europe.

"There were several hundred foreign journalists in Germany, including those from the main international news agencies, who reported freely on what they saw and heard," Gilbert wrote about this period. "No event in the history of the fate of German Jews between 1933 and 1945 was so widely covered by the newspapers while it was taking place," he wrote of Kristallnacht.

That hideous night of terror and broken glass must have sent a wracking shock of horror throughout the decent consciences of the world. Kristallnacht was the tearing away of the curtain from German pretences and prevarications. Hitler's plans for the Jews were now plain for all to see. And his plan for Europe was easy to imagine.

Kristallnacht was considered the prelude for the premeditated, precisely detailed annihilation of European Jewry. And thus, for that reason today some 73 years later, throughout Canada, communities have dedicated time, space and the earnest strivings of the spirit to learn and teach about the Holocaust in Holocaust Education Week.

The Atlantic Jewish Council succinctly describes Holocaust Education Week as a "weeklong series of educational events relating to the Holocaust." It is in its eighth year there. The council will hold a community-wide Kristallnacht Memorial on Nov. 9. But it eloquently and poignantly refers to that day as Dignity Day, a solemnly symbolic and pointedly substantive rebuke of the violence associated with Kristallnacht.

Readers should also know that events are scheduled this year for Halifax, Sydney, Cape Breton and Moncton. Last year, the Nova Scotia legislature unanimously passed a resolution establishing Nov. 1 to 9 as Holocaust Education Week.

In Montreal, Hillel is hosting the community's activities.

In Toronto, the community marks its 31st annual week of Holocaust education. The emotional and educational core of the week is, of course, the personal testimonies of the survivors. This year, the organizers are also highlighting 50 years since the trial of Adolf Eichmann.

Though they are, perhaps, the most important audience, it is not only the young ones of the community for whom this education week was created. It now also informs the community at large. The day that was once so savage and so brutal for the Jews of Germany has, over time, been transformed in their memory as a commemorative day of dignity. Indeed Holocaust Education Week is itself a heartening collection of a number of days of dignity.

Trudeau minister served in Battle of Normandy

Compiled by CJN staff

Toronto native and former Trudeau-era cabinet minister Barney Danson passed away Oct. 17 at the age of 90.

Danson, born to a Jewish family in Toronto in 1921, joined the Queen's Own Rifles in 1939 at the start of World War II. He attained the rank of lieutenant colonel and served until he was severely wounded in the Battle of Normandy, losing an eye.

In addition to his political career, Danson maintained philanthropic interests in the Canadian National Institute for the Blind and co-founded Katimavik, a national program that helps and encourages youth to volunteer across the country.

After returning from the war, Danson joined his family's insurance business and eventually started his own plastics company, the Danson Corporation.

Inspired by Trudeaumania, he ran for office in 1968 and won the riding of York North. He served as an MP until losing his seat in 1979.

In cabinet, he held positions as minister of state for urban affairs and as minister of national defence.

In 1975, he received the Family of Man award from B'nai Brith of Canada.

Danson also served as Canada's consul general in Boston from 1984 to 1986.

His autobiography, Not Bad for a Sergeant: The Memoirs of Barney Danson, was published in 2002.

He was the founding chairman of Toronto's Temple Emanu-El.

Danson also served on numerous boards and committees, both non-profit and for-profit, including the Canadian Executive Services Organization, Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, the Atlantic Council, the Empire Club of Canada, the Ballet Opera House Corporation, de Havilland Aircraft of Canada, Algoma Central Corporation, General Steelwares, the Royal Conservatory of Music and the Canadian Council for Aboriginal Business.

He also chaired the advisory committee and presided over the construction and eventual 2005 opening of the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa, where a theatre is named in his honour.

In 2008 he was made a Companion to the Order of Canada.

In a statement last week, the Canadian War Museum said it was saddened at Danson's death.

"Barney Danson's leadership and tireless support were instrumental in the building of the new museum," Mark O'Neill, president and CEO of the Canadian Museum of Civilization Corporation said. "On a personal note, Mr. Danson was an inspiration to me, and I often sought his sage advice. I offer my heartfelt condolences to his family."

The statement added: "Mr. Danson's energetic dedication to the creation of a new Canadian War Museum was based, in part, on his desire to memorialize the brave Canadians who died in war, including his four closest wartime friends, all of whom were killed in action.

"The Barney Danson Theatre in the Canadian War Museum is named in recognition of his key role in the creation of the museum. Tens of thousands of Canadians have already enjoyed events and public programs in the Barney Danson Theatre, and will continue to do so for generations to come. Mr. Danson's contributions will not be forgotten."

Danson and his wife, Isobel, have four children, Kenneth, John, Timothy and Peter, and 10 grandchildren.

Reena is very proud of its

Developmental Disabilities Counsellor Program (DDC)

By: Stacey Donaghy- Manager Reena's Learning & Development Department

The DDC Program is a joint Reena and George Brown College Certificate Program, in partnership with two other developmental Services Providers; Kerry's Place Autism Services, and Montage Support Services.

This highly acclaimed training program is a great opportunity for people wishing to pursue a career in the Developmental Services Sector. It is a 4-month intensive program that offers students a full academic portfolio; over 26 courses, and 2-months of hands-on experience in the sector, that is closely monitored and assessed for each student's success.

What makes our program unique; is the close partnership of a developmental services provider and a college, working hand-in-hand to deliver the most optimal training experience to our students. The 4-month certificate is a one of a kind offering. It allows adults wanting to enter our sector the opportunity to do so while maintaining some form of income or ability to quickly re-engage in the job market, thus not having to give up everything in order to pursue a career path. Don't get us wrong, we are not saying that our program is easy. On the contrary, our students work hard to achieve success, we wouldn't have it any other way..... after all they are the staff of our future!

We recently completed the March 2011 program offering which began on March 21st; most of the students are now employed with Reena and partnering agencies. As they move forward in their careers, we also move forward. Our marketing has begun for the March 2012 session, and we hope to see many committed, dedicated, and enthusiastic applicants for next year's DDC program.

We are extremely pleased to announce that of the 11 sessions run, 259 students have graduated this program. That's 259 well trained and committed staff to our sector!

Over the past year two former graduates of the DDC Program were hired as Supervisors at Reena and the reports from our Partners are that students within their systems have also taken on senior roles.

Historian to open program

Historian Deborah Lipstadt's latest book, The Eichmann Trial, whose appearance on the 50th anniversary of the storied court action she says is mere coincidence, is intended both as a primer and a corrective.

Holocaust Education Week

"It's a corrective in two areas," says the Emory University history professor on the phone from Atlanta. "One in terms of Hannah Arendt [the controversial author of Eichmann in Jerusalem] and two, in terms of the idea that before this trial, nobody had heard from Holocaust survivors, that survivors had not spoken about what happened to them. We know that's not true. A number of historians have now shown that survivors were speaking up, and the notion that the Eichmann trial pierced the silence is simply not correct."

It wasn't so much that this was the first time survivors spoke publicly, she adds, "but it was the first time the world was listening in such a serious fashion."

Deborah Lipstadt

Lipstadt will be the featured speaker at the opening of this year's Holocaust Education Week, whose theme is "Accountability: 50 Years Since the Eichmann Trial." She will discuss her newest book and the resonance of the trial on Nov. 1 at Holy Blossom Temple, 7:30 p.m.

As for Arendt, whose own book on the Eichmann trial was for decades considered a staple, Lipstadt, in attempting to set the record straight, offers up much that will please some readers, infuriate others, and raise a few eyebrows.

The broad strokes are now burned into the Jewish psyche: SS Lt.-Col. Adolf Eichmann, a major architect of the Final Solution, slipped away after World War II but was found by Israeli agents living under a false identity in Buenos Aires, Argentina. In an operation that electrified the world (and heaped scorn on Israel in many quarters for violating another country's sovereignty), Eichmann was captured by Mossad operatives in 1960 and brought to Jerusalem to face charges.

Following a trial denounced by detractors as a kangaroo court and others as treatment too kind and fair, Eichmann was found guilty of war crimes and crimes against humanity, and hanged on May 31, 1962. He remains the only person to have been executed in Israel following conviction by a civilian court.

Even as a "primer," Lipstadt's book upends many notions that may have been held until now, including just how accurate the prosecution's arguments were, whether Eichmann was a mere cog in a giant killing machine, and that he proved a tougher witness than had been thought.

Among public misconceptions, Lipstadt says, was that Eichmann "was the man who planned and carried out the Final Solution. [But] he was not the CEO. He was one of the COOs [chief operating officers] of the Final Solution."

Indeed, as she writes, prosecutor Gideon Hausner "got much of the history wrong" and pushed "past the evidence," accusing Eichmann "of things for which he was not responsible." In contrast to Hausner's accusations, Eichmann "did play a decisive role in aspects of the Final Solution, though he certainly did not control most aspects of it.

"Hausner made the man in the glass booth look more mythic than real."

But was Eichmann more than just a clerk, as many have viewed him?

"Oh God, yes," Lipstadt tells The CJN. "Absolutely."

And the defendant proved "disciplined" and "well-prepared." At times, "he really managed to prevail over Hausner more so than vice-versa."

Lipstadt, whose famous legal tangle with British Holocaust revisionist David Irving resulted in her award-winning 2006 book History on Trial, about the libel lawsuit Irving launched against her [and lost], says she was "struck by the fact that writing this [latest book] did bring me back to being a defendant." Having been in the dock, she notes the dark absurdity of deniers' logic: that while the Holocaust is a myth, "the Jews' nefarious behaviour made them nevertheless deserving of being destroyed."

Lipstadt allocates a good chunk of her latest effort on Arendt, who covered the Eichmann trial for The New Yorker and polarized many readers with her often harsh depictions of Israeli society. In fact, writes Lipstadt, Arendt "voiced a personal disdain for Israel that bordered on antisemitism and racism."

Though Arendt correctly deduced that contrary to Hausner's exaggerated claims, Eichmann was not the linchpin of the Final Solution, "she veered in the opposite direction" and famously declared him "a desk-level bureaucrat who showed little initiative and had few talents."

With Schalit safe, Israel asked to save Abbas

Home a week and a half, Gilad Schalit is rebuilding his life in bits and pieces of ordinary humanity. He has gone to the beach with his father, where bystanders reported seeing the two wading into the water, laughing at the waves, casting soulful eyes to the sea's far horizon and, simply, walking free.

Not surprisingly, given his confinement for more than five years to small spaces and large darknesses, walking seems to be a key part of Gilad's regimen of restoration. The newspapers have reported that he has gone on walks with his brother, his mother and his father.

Gilad is healing, his father and his friends say, even as they plead that the 25-year-old's privacy be respected.

Now that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has rescued Gilad Schalit, he is being asked to "rescue" Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, too.

Hamas has gained considerable purchase with the proverbial Palestinian man on the street. By repatriating hundreds of prisoners from Israeli jails, it has delivered the goods, so to speak. And to keep the pressure on the PA, it keeps the prisoner-release drum beat pounding. Ahmed Jabari, the head of Hamas' military wing, last weekend threatened more kidnappings of Israelis. "Those same operations will continue as long as there are Palestinian prisoners in jail in Israel," Jabari said.

Abbas and the PA are now seen by the Ramallah street as being weaker than Hamas. And it falls to Israel, some people maintain, to boost Abbas' standing and resuscitate his political stature with his own people. These very same individuals seem to have forgotten about Abbas' UN ploy last month and his massive betrayal of the American administration, the EU, the Quartet and even, it can be said, his putative Israeli bargaining partner.

The Abbas-rescue suggestions are many. They include increasing the number of Palestinians to be released under the next phase of the Schalit deal, returning the bodies of slain terrorists, and transferring additional portions of the West Bank to exclusive PA control. Indeed Netanyahu last weekend renewed his offer of a partial freeze on construction in the West Bank. But Abbas has expressed no willingness to return to the table. And herein lies the major problem for the government of Israel. It is entirely uncertain of Abbas' intentions. Does he plan to resume bilateral negotiations?

Once again, Israel is being asked to give the PA a tactical, stature-enhancing, confidence-building quid without receiving a reciprocal quo. If Abbas would return to the table, he would quickly see that merely by sitting across from his adversaries, making his people's case, his stature would soar among his own people – and with Israelis.

25 years ago in The CJN

The United Nations General Assembly rejected by a large margin an Arab motion sponsored by Oman calling for Israel's suspension from the 41st session of the world body. The vote – 87-41 against with 13 abstentions and 17 absences – followed a similar one in 1985 that was defeated 83-41.

The price of Judaism

I would like to comment on the column "Synagogue dues and don'ts" (Oct. 6). One statement near the end of the article summarized it all: "I recognize that money needs to be raised and bills need to be paid." I feel the column trivialized the mundane fiduciary obligations to keep a synagogue physically intact. I don't know of any synagogue that makes a profit keeping its doors open. Many synagogues leverage their lines of credit to function. Many synagogues have empty seats on High Holidays, fully paid for but with no one occupying them. Perhaps that is indicative of the real problem. Have we as Jews lost our value system? Just speak to people who have children and listen to their "bone rattling" interpretation of the cost of being Jewish and practising Judaism. Anything of value has a price. When we want it, we pay for it. If we don't need it, we stay home.

Criticism of Chrétien gov't unfair

There may have been reason to criticize the Canadian government's support of Israel under prime minister Jean Chrétien 10 years ago, but its performance at Durban I (the UN World Conference Against Racism) was not one of them (The Durban war, 10 years on," Sept. 22). While I agree with Gerald Steinberg's column, his characterization of the Canadian government at that time is somewhat unfair. I had the privilege of meeting Rabbi Michael Melchior at a Canada-Israel Committee meeting in Israel directly after his return from Durban I. He was the minister for the Diaspora in the Israeli government at the time. Rabbi Melchior was quite pleased with Canada and its comportment at Durban I. The United States was not present at Durban I. Canada jumped into the breach and was very active behind the scenes in attempting to ameliorate the anti-Israel diatribes that were coming forward and in general was very supportive of Israel.

A one-state solution

I was surprised to read your editorial in which you lambasted the CBC for a segment they ran on the radio program The Current ("Et tu CBC?" Oct. 12). They had two panelists, one a Jewish Israeli and the other you called a Chicago-based Palestinian activist, discussing the possibility of a one-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. You took the position that allowing the discussion to take place on such a subject reflected a bias against the Jewish state that the CBC should be held responsible for.

What caused my surprise at your comments was that you published an opinion piece, written by Arie Raif of the Canadian Peres Center for Peace, that dealt with the same topic as a distinct possibility if an agreement is not reached soon ("Old habits die hard: divided in peace, united in war," Oct. 6). He wrote that "failure to reach an agreement could result in the PA handing the keys of the West Bank to Israel, meaning the latter would be directly responsible for the welfare and policing of 2.5 million stateless Palestinians." He continued that "controlling the West Bank is not Israel's inevitable destiny, but it has been an issue since 1967, evolving and expanding [our presence there]... preventing any real chance for peace."

So it is not only invited guests on the CBC that are thinking about and discussing what would happen if a two-state solution is not achieved. Everyone concerned about Israel's future has to be realistic in looking objectively at its situation today – the dangers and the opportunities – but not by keeping our heads in the sand and refusing to listen to warnings on the direction the country could be heading.

World turned upside down

Arie Raif's essay ("Old habits die hard: divided in peace, united in war," Oct. 6) is a prime example of what Melanie Phillips deplored in her latest book The World Turned Upside Down: "an implacable refusal... to acknowledge the authority of factual evidence over opinion, or distinguish truth from propaganda and lies, or differentiate between justice and injustice." The Israeli government ought to put an end to this ongoing rampage against factual evidence and truth and assert the Jewish People's rights to the Land of Israel.

Welcoming Gilad home with mixed emotions

— 'Let's remember what it took to bring him home' —

Jason Kimelman
Special to The CJN

On July 28, 1990, my 17-year-old sister was enjoying the sun and some ice cream on a Tel Aviv beach with her friends. She had been in Israel on an organized tour. There were hundreds of people on the beach that day when a man-made pipe bomb, which had been buried beneath the sand, suddenly exploded and killed my sister, Marnie. She was the only person who died on the beach that day.

A man named Yasser Hijazi accepted responsibility for the murder. I learned that he was affiliated with Izzedine al-Qassam Brigade, which is the military wing of the Islamic fundamentalist group Hamas. A few months after the bombing, he was arrested and tried at the Yehuda Military Court near Jerusalem. He was sentenced to life in prison.

Marnie Kimelman who was killed on July 8, 1990 on a Tel Aviv beach.

I am a strong supporter of Israel. Always was, always will be. I am also a supporter of Israel's current Prime Minister, Benjamim Netanyahu. His strength and integrity have always impressed me. His own brother was killed responding to a terrorist attack, and I have always felt a connection with him.

I was overjoyed to hear two weeks ago that Israel had negotiated a prisoner exchange with Hamas. In exchange for the release of more than 1,000 Palestinians from Israeli prisons, Gilad Schalit, a young Israeli soldier who was captured by Hamas in 2006 and who has remained in their custody ever since, would be released and returned to his family and nation. I could only think of his parents at that moment. No one on earth could understand the hell they have lived in for the past five years.

And no one can understand the emotions they have dealt with since they heard that Gilad would be released. I looked forward to seeing the first clips of Gilad in the news and the interviews with family members that would follow.

On the morning of Oct. 16, I woke up to an e-mail sent by a loyal and good friend in Israel. It read: "Dear Jason, Pursuant to the Gilad Schalit prisoner release and the list of Palestinian prisoners scheduled to be released published last night, I checked the Israeli Prison Service, and found that one of them is your sister's killer. He's to be released to his home in the West Bank with certain restrictions... I am so sorry I had to contact you under these circumstances, and if there's anything I can do to help, please let me know."

This hit me hard.

I've read about shock before and think I experienced it for the second time that morning. I was livid. My soul was rocked.

Do I get on a plane to Israel? Do I call Netanyahu's office? Do I tell my parents, my brother, my zaidy? Do I keep it to myself and hope my parents don't find out? What would they say if they did?

Without time to rationalize, I responded to my friend by thanking him for contacting me, and I asked that he ensure that Netanyahu's office call me to explain their decision and thought process. Knowing full well that my request was unreasonable, I figured it could not be more unreasonable than deciding to release a savage beast who killed a beautiful, innocent 17-year-old Canadian girl who was eating ice cream on a beach.

This prisoner exchange is confusing for Israelis and Jews throughout the world, but especially for the thousands of people who have been directly affected by those criminals who are being released from prison. I believe we deserve and are entitled to an explanation.

I am thrilled for the Schalit family. I hope to speak with them one day and tell them that. But as delighted as they are right now, I bet they, too, are confused. I bet they do not know exactly how to feel when they walk past their neighbours whose child has been killed by one of the prisoners to be released. I bet even Gilad himself will have mixed emotions when he hears how many with blood on their hands have been released.

I know that this is an unrealistic proposition given the nature and confidentiality of the negotiations between Israel and Hamas, but if Netanyahu's office had called me beforehand to ask my permission to release the beast who killed my sister, in exchange for Gilad's freedom, I would have eventually granted it. I would have eventually worked through the anger and realized that no one is bringing my sister back and if, in some way, my sister's death could help the Schalits end their nightmare, I would have given the Israeli government my blessing.

> 'While many Israelis celebrate Gilad's return in the streets of Tel Aviv, I will be thinking about Hijazi's family welcoming a cold-blooded killer home and dancing through the streets of the West Bank chanting, "We want another Schalit."'

But my family was not consulted. We did not have the opportunity to think this through. We were pulled out of bed with e-mail notifications that the scabs on our lifelong and deep wounds were to be ripped off.

I feel ripped off. And confused.

I am writing this for no reason other than the fact that I have so many questions. Questions that have yet to be answered. And I assume I am not alone.

As we celebrate the release of Gilad, let's remember what it took to bring him home. Remember the families that are suffering through this. Remember that while many Israelis celebrate Gilad's return in the streets of Tel Aviv, I will be thinking about Hijazi's family welcoming a cold-blooded killer home and dancing through the streets of the West Bank chanting, "We want another Schalit."

Gilad's parents, Noam and Aviva, greet their son for the first time in more than five years. [Israel Sun photo]

Dancing on my sister's grave.

Dancing on the graves of thousands of Israelis who have been murdered by terrorist organizations.

I have recently been advised that Prime Minister Netanyahu's office wrote to many of the families – at least in Israel – of the victims of individuals who were released as part of the exchange. My family has not received the courtesy of an explanation.

My intention is not to stir up emotions. Rather it is to provide some perspective.

I can only hope that people will respect my family's need for privacy in relation to the news of the past few days. My family is very happy for the Schalits. But our feelings will always be mixed.

Finding new meaning, yet again

There's no doubt that today's uncertainties are enough to sober our enthusiasm. Such a sombre mood is reflected in every part of our lives, whether economic, political or personal. Things seem to be slipping out of control of the ordinary person.

One example: we have the Wall Street protesters without a real agenda, making their proclamation that there is no agenda. Do I need to cite the economic roller-coaster we are on or the fracturing of our social services? Suddenly we are wary of our leaders, no matter which party they're from. Are they up to the challenge? Come to think of it, what do we really want from them when we go to vote? Are they telling us the truth about anything?

Just when we might sink into cynical despair, fortunately, there's always a good story to bring us back up. Scarcely out of the holiday cycle, we begin anew the reading of the Torah, starting with the magisterial account of creation. It's not a literal account. Science has no place in this story, which is meant to teach us ethical and moral principles.

The Jewish holidays have a reassuring motion, marching along in regular fashion, each in its appointed season. Every year, we begin at the beginning of the world and read the same five books, over and over again, adding Haftarot that amplify a theme of the weekly Torah readings. It is indeed a never-ending story. Each year we, however, have brought to this cycle a year's worth of different experiences, for good or ill, and through that lens, we understand.

The first chapters of Bereshit are an account of struggles – between God and man, between brothers, between humankind and the world – that God wants to see grow out of the initial creation.

One year we think, how silly of Eve to trust that sly serpent. The next we wonder how an almighty Creator could say, "Don't eat that!" Surely such a Presence would know that telling humans not to do something inevitably results in them doing it the first chance they get.

Jean M. Gerber

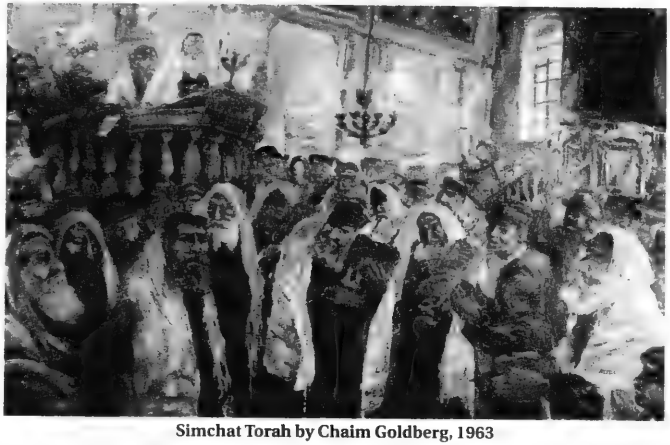
Reading Noah one year, we may feel vindicated that Noah believed, obeyed and escaped while all others perished. Another year we might picture in brutal clarity the chaos as families clung together on the high ground while the waters rose inexorably.

Our patriarchs and matriarchs struggled to create out of one family, a nation (or two – remember Ishmael). One year we excuse Abraham for his half-truth about Sarah's status, knowing she could be at risk if he admits that she is his wife. Next time around, we may be appalled that he would put her in such jeopardy.

One year we see the rightness of Hagar's banishment, the next we marvel at Abraham's callous treatment of her, as she is thrust with her son into the waterless wilderness to die. One year, Jacob is a conniving, sneaky young lad, the next an ardent suitor willing to put up with being forced into 20 years labour to claim his bride and his wages.



Simchat Torah by Chaim Goldberg, 1963

One year, we fall in love with Joseph the ultimate, handsome survivor. The next year, he seems a bratty teenager thinking only of himself.

And who can remain unmoved when Moshe dies within sight of the Promised Land? He has seen his brother and sister die without achieving their goal, and his whole generation has been buried in the wilderness. It's nice to say that he died a vigorous man, but I picture him frail, bent, gazing over the Jordan River, his watery eyes straining to see the hilltops of Canaan.

One year, King David is the ruddy, charismatic youth who becomes a national hero and saves Israel from the erratic rule of King Shaul. The next he is a usurper and adulterer – that's what the story says, so no point putting a gloss on his actions.

Are we able, in our annual round, to find new meaning? I hope so. We celebrated Simchat Torah marking the completion of our Torah reading and immediately began with order being brought out of chaos, a dark formless world being turned into a seasonless garden. It's a whole new adventure all over again – same cast of characters, same situations, a fresh window into a familiar, yet ever-new, story cycle.

In our end is always a beginning.

So many friends

When I came to Montreal in 1970, I found it difficult to make new friends. I thought the problem sprang from Montreal's tightly knit community. People here still knew their high school buddies. They met people on the streets with whom they had gone to kindergarten. I wrote about this once before.

But I was wrong. The problem originated with me. I struggled with a number of misconceptions. I felt blessed that I had already had a number of BFFs (best friend forever). How many good friends was a person entitled to? Surely the number was limited and I had used mine up, I mistakenly thought. Moving here, I didn't expect to make anything more than acquaintances, and, therefore, did not extend myself in friendship. I remember all the people who tried to befriend us. Howard, my husband, responded, but it took me many years to see the genuine friendship that was being offered.

But my greatest error was in misjudging everyone based on my own biases. I believed that no one in the Jewish community could be a true friend to a rabbi, his wife and family. Surely, distance was the only safe possibility. Forty years later, secure in and sustained by the friendship of a large community, I can only laugh at my childishness and prejudices.

In fact, my first encounter with a future BFF was quite hilarious. A young woman on our block approached me. We chatted. She asked me what my husband did for a living. "Uh oh!" I thought. "If I tell her, she will look at me differently. What kind of a woman would marry a rabbi?"

So I said: "I can't tell you." With that kind of an answer she really did look at me oddly. Things really went off the rails. She thought I was married to a mafia boss. Which was worse: a rabbi or a mafia boss?

At this point in my life, with my children all living in the United States and my husband in a hospital, I have come to appreciate, understand and cherish the place of friends. Quite simply, we need them in order to exist.

My husband and I have no family in Canada. We rely on friends for all sorts of things, in good times and now in the difficult moments. When we were raising our children, we celebrated with our friends and their kids. I remember Chanukah parties with toys, latkes and laughter, and sukkah celebrations in the cold, with friends coming together to learn, live and laugh.

We travel to see our children and grandchildren quite regularly, but our daily and weekly lives are punctuated with our friendship circles. I couldn't imagine life without my friends, and I'm glad to have realized that there is no limited number of BFFs. As long as we're able to extend ourselves in friendship, to see others as significant individuals with whom we wish to engage in meaningful communication, then we can be blessed with associations that develop and grow into long lasting friendships.

John Lennon wrote: "I get by with a little help from my friends." That's exactly how I feel.

And now in our trying times, with Howard fighting to regain his reality, I have found a whole new meaning or genre of friendship. There are friends who visit and cheer us up, who tell long unending stories to feed our imagination, friends who sing the Song of Songs to feed our souls. Friends who bring all sorts of good food, some of it on silver trays, glass plates, with fancy cutlery and decorations so we can eat elegantly (or pretend to). Friends, who smile, tell jokes and just sit with us.

There are those friends who give good advice and those who know when to refrain from advising. Friends who let us use their places and friends who stay with us to keep us company. Friends who bring news of the outside world. Friends who walk with us. Friends who are there for us. So many friends that my heart overflows.

No one can be pessimistic about the world or the state of the nation or the values of our families or the future of the Jewish people if they know my circle of friends.

Novelist Eva Menasse is a rising star in Germany

At the age of 41, Eva Menasse is sitting pretty, but she does not take anything for granted, nor is she animated by any sense of entitlement.

Menasse's debut novel, Vienna, published in 2005, was a phenomenal success, with 50,000 hardcover copies having been sold in Germany and Austria alone.

Translated into more than 10 languages, including English and Hebrew, Vienna was also published in Canada and Britain, though it has yet to appear in the primary English-language market, the United States. Hailed by critics, Vienna was nominated for the Leipzig Book Fair Prize, won the Rolf Heyne Debut Prize in Germany and was shortlisted for the Independent Foreign Fiction Prize in Britain.

Sheldon Kirshner in Berlin

Her second book, Forgivable Deadly Sins, a collection of short stories also published in Hungary, Spain and the Netherlands, came out in 2009, selling a respectable 20,000 hardcover copies.

As a result of these literary coups, Menasse – a journalist who was born in Austria but has lived in Berlin for the past eight years – can support herself and concentrate on consolidating her career as a novelist. "But I don't know how long this will last," she confided in an interview in Berlin, knowing full well that life can be arbitrarily fickle.

Menasse's realistic appreciation of life's vicissitudes is reflected in mirror-like fashion in Vienna, her wry, uproarious and affecting novel about ethnic and religious identity in a half-Jewish Austrian family from the 1930s to the present.

A tall, slender, vivacious woman who merrily rides around Berlin on a bicycle regardless of the weather, she wrote Vienna from the heart, starting it in 2002, when she was still on the staff of the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, one of Germany's finest daily newspapers.

In a word, Vienna is autobiographical, modelled on her own family. "It's autobiographical in outline, but in substance it's a work based on my imagination."

The driving force behind Vienna was curiosity, a thirst to ascertain, once and for all, what happened to her family during the Holocaust. "My father and my uncle didn't remember the details, and my grandparents were dead," she noted, adding that she was familiar only with the bare bones of their story.

Menasse's family history is complicated, to say the least. Her paternal Jewish ancestors were originally from Tarnow, a town in Poland whose Jewish population was decimated by the Nazis. Her maternal Catholic ancestors hailed from Silesia and Bohemia.

Menasse's father, Hans, born in 1930, was the son of a Jewish man and a Catholic woman. Her fully Catholic mother, Christine, was born in Poland in 1943.

Fearing the spectre of antisemitism in Austria after its unilateral annexation by Nazi Germany, Hans Menasse's parents sent him to Britain in 1938 on a Kindertransport. They remained behind in Vienna, braving persecution.

Menasse's aunt immigrated to Canada, settling in Windsor, Ont.

Her great-grandmother, Berta, was deported to Theresienstadt in 1943 and died there. Her grandfather's relatives were either murdered or emigrated.

Hans Menasse, now 81, returned to Austria in 1947, becoming a gifted professional soccer player and a member of Austria's national team in the 1950s. After his retirement, he was a press officer for a major Hollywood film company. Always ambivalent about his Jewish background, he never encouraged Menasse or her siblings – Robert, a writer and translator, and Tina, a biologist – to practise Judaism.

"He doesn't want me to be Jewish," said Menasse, who wore a simple necklace with a stylized Star of David when I met her. "He wants me to be a 'normal' Austrian. He has a problem with my necklace, which I bought in Israel. For many years, he didn't want to touch the Jewish part of his life."

When asked whether she considers herself Jewish, she replied, "Yes and no." Although she attended church services as a child, she feels culturally Jewish today.

The wife of German writer/journalist Michael Kumpfmuller, she is not a religious person, but would have joined Berlin's Jewish community had she felt she would be wholeheartedly welcomed as a non-halachic Jew.

Menasse studied history and German literature and broke into journalism when she began writing for the Austrian newsmagazine Profil. She was a general assignment reporter there for seven years.

Joining the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, she covered the cultural scene in Vienna, as well as the trial of British Holocaust denier David Irving, whom she acidly likens to "a bit of dog shit on your shoe."

After converting her coverage into her first book, The Holocaust on Trial, she composed Vienna, which established her as a rising star in German literature.

She claims she had no difficulty making the transition from the grind of journalism to the solitude of novel writing. "It came naturally," she said without a trace of affectation.

She was planning to return to her job at the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung after the publication of Vienna, but changed her mind as sales soared. "I was surprised and overwhelmed," said Menasse, the mother of a five-year-old boy.

Asked to explain its popularity, she replied, "There was something new in the book. It was written from the perspective of the second and third generation of children of Jewish survivors of the Holocaust."

And the humour was appealing, she noted. "Some readers were relieved by its tone. They said, 'We can laugh again.'"

Comparing her novel to her short stories, she remarked, "I always say Vienna is my 'Jewish' book and Forgivable Deadly Sins is my 'Catholic' book."

Though critics in Germany were receptive to Vienna, their counterparts in Austria were lukewarm. The discrepancy, she observed, was a function of the manner in which each country has dealt with the legacy of the Holocaust.

"Austria has finally come to terms with its Nazi past, but for a long time it considered itself Hitler's first victim. Germany was different. It confronted its crimes, and has learned from its history."

She has no intention of going back to live in Austria, but she keeps abreast of current events there. "Compared to Vienna, the atmosphere in Berlin is much more open and liberal and less traditional and conservative."

Although she has begun writing a new novel, due to be published in 2013, Menasse remains a working journalist in a freelance capacity. In recent years, she has contributed book reviews and political analyses to Die Zeit, Der Spiegel and Suddeutsche Zeitung. "I enjoy journalism. I can choose the topics."

Menasse does not profess to be worried by the presence of neo-Nazis in Germany and Austria.

"They don't play any role in the political landscape. But given my family background, I would be happier if they didn't exist at all."

Fundraiser to aid Israeli home for abused kids

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Forever Chai Foundation of Canada presents its second "Night of the Stars," featuring the Superstars of Motown's Golden Era, including the Spinners and the Temptations Review with Dennis Edwards, Nov. 1, at the George Weston Recital Hall.

The foundation helps support Shabtai Levi Home in Haifa, an emergency and residential care service for physically and emotionally abused children.

The seeds for the foundation were planted about 20 years ago, when Chana Sargon, a Toronto Bible teacher, visited the Shabtai Levi Home.

She was so taken with the non-denominational home, which opened as a daycare in 1945, that she tried to establish a relationship between her students and Shabtai Levi.

Over $700,000 raised by 2008

In 2002, a group of women formed the Canadian Friends of the Shabtai Levi Home – now called Forever Chai Foundation of Canada – chaired by Ellen Goldstein, Marya Grad, Esther Michaels and Cynthia Small.

By 2008, they had raised more than $700,000 for the home – the foundation is the largest contributor to the home, after the government of Israel – and more specifically for its first mother-child unit, which enables mothers with parenting difficulties to live with their babies in a closely supervised environment.

The goals of the mother-child unit are to protect the child without separation from its mother, to rehabilitate the mother-child relationship and to lay the foundation for the mother to live on her own in the community, in terms of child-raising, household management, economic responsibility and working outside the home.

Treatment includes 24-hour-a-day friendly intervention by caregivers, with the help of volunteers, evaluation and intensive treatment by social workers and psychologists, and diagnosis by outside agencies.

Goldstein said that while visiting Shabtai Levi, she met a girl who had become pregnant as a young teenager and went there to receive help bringing up her child.

"She was very thankful to be there. We are teaching people to stand on their own two feet and to be fully integrated into Israeli society."

Funds from the Nov. 1 concert, produced by Rrazz Entertainment, will help pay for therapists, doctors, nurses, food, medication, clothes, toys, pets, outings, caretakers, security and sundries for the care required at the home.

Teacher shifts from marketing to the classroom

When Jennifer Rosenberg began studying for her bachelor of education degree last year at age 37, she was overwhelmed to be back in the classroom.

It had been more than a decade since she received her MBA from the University of Windsor in 1997, and she'd had a 14-year career in marketing. As well, the married mother of two daughters, now 6 and 2, was facing a five-day-a-week commute of 80 minutes from her home in Thornhill to Lakehead University's Orillia campus – and back again.

By Frances Kraft

But today the rookie teacher, who began teaching at Neshamah Congregation of Thornhill's Sunday School this week, is glad she made the move. She credits her husband for his support, and a friend who had also gone back to school for giving her the confidence that she could do it, too.

Rosenberg was inspired as well by her older daughter's enthusiasm for learning, and her own background teaching tennis and working as a camp counsellor in her teens and early 20s.

In May and June, she volunteered at Associated Hebrew School's Kamin branch. She is also working as a supply teacher with the York Region District School Board.

In both cases, she's returning to her roots. An alumna of Associated, Rosenberg attended the Jewish day school until Grade 6. She's also a graduate of Thornlea Secondary School.

A lesson from the teacher: "I looked for inspirational quotes when I was applying to [teaching,] and this one by Vernon Howard kind of spoke to me: 'Always walk through life as if you have something new to learn and you will.'"

Rosenberg believes that many of the skills she used in her previous career are transferable to the classroom. Creating and delivering a presentation is like preparing a lesson plan and then teaching it, she said. "Your audience is just younger."

As well, time management, leadership and organizational skills, as well as the importance of assessing results, come into play both in marketing and teaching, she believes.

At one time, Rosenberg thought about pursuing a career in marketing for kids – perhaps at a toy company – but instead she ended up working in the fashion world.

On her second maternity leave, "things became a lot clearer," she said. She had spent time volunteering in a friend's classroom and found it rewarding to help children learn.

At Neshamah, a new Reform congregation, Rosenberg will teach every grade. Each morning will be divided into three segments, and students will rotate from one centre to another. "I'm very excited," she said.

Reflecting on her previous career, Rosenberg wrote in an e-mail that working as a brand and marketing manager taught her "the importance of appreciating individual differences among people... each person has their own set of beliefs, interests and abilities that affect how they learn and work.

"I've learned that teaching is not merely about repetition. It is about being curious, asking questions and learning how to think."

Harbord Club founder honoured

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Willie Zimmerman, a 1933 graduate of Harbord Collegiate Institute who died last February, was honoured at the downtown Toronto high school's Oct. 7 commencement, when an award was renamed in his honour.

The monetary award recognizes a student who has contributed to the school community.

Murray Rubin, a 1950 graduate who spoke about Zimmerman at the commencement, called him a "catalyst" who was instrumental in forming the Harbord Club – an organization for alumni with a network of some 2,000 people – in 1978. The affiliated Harbord Charitable Foundation, which has given up to $15,000 a year in scholarships, garnered from the interest earned by its funds, was established shortly afterward.

Zimmerman's daughter, Sarilyn, speaking at the commencement, told students that her father "had a deep respect and love of education. He grew up in a generation where going to university was often not a possibility and a high school education was still considered a privilege.

"Forming the Harbord Club was the way he honoured this privilege."

The club, which now has a network of more than 2,000 alumni, provides 66 prizes, awards and scholarships to Harbord students and maintains "a common identity and passion among former students and teachers," Rubin said. Funds raised by the club have also provided a World War II monument to school alumni who lost their lives during the war.

Rubin told The CJN that the foundation has about $300,000 in funds donated by Harbord graduates.

Another of the club's projects was the school's museum, which – according to a recent issue of the club's newsletter, the Harbordite – was the first architecturally designed high school museum in Canada.

From the late 1920s to the mid-1950s, Harbord had a Jewish population of an estimated 90 per cent. Today the school has a high percentage of Asian students, followed by Portuguese, Italian and Spanish-speaking students, according to principal Rodrigo Fuentes, who spoke briefly about Zimmerman at the commencement.

Willie Zimmerman

Zimmerman – a printer who amassed a large, well-organized collection of Harbord memorabilia, which he donated to the school museum – took the initiative in establishing the club "because he really loved the school," said Rubin, the club's president ex officio. Zimmerman remained active in the club until 2000.

Zimmerman's daughter, Sarilyn, wrote in the Spring 2011 issue of the Harbordite, that her father's interest in Harbord filled "many happy hours... from the weekly meetings and lunches, to organizing reunions, to the inception of the archival museums, to the printing of the Harbordite."

She told The CJN that her father was "a very creative man. He managed to raise funds and search out [former alumni]" from far-flung locales through one-on-one conversations.

"He loved to research everything... He was like the information man. Anybody who knew him, if they didn't know the answer to something, would ask him. If he didn't know the answer, he would look it up and find it."

York Region's Bialik Day School to open its doors in September 2013

Long-time Toronto institution to benefit children north of Steeles

By Daniel Horowitz

Having recently celebrated its 50th anniversary, Toronto's Bialik Hebrew Day school, located at Bathurst Street and Viewmount Avenue, has long-been synonymous with excellence in Jewish day school education.

Founded by members of the Labour Zionist movement, including Ben and Edith Himel z'l, Viewmount continues to successfully engage an eclectic range of community members, providing them with strong connections to Jewish and Zionist values and an enriched academic environment.

Fast forward to a new millennium and the year 2011, and it seems that everything old is, as the adage goes, new again.

Made possible in large part to a generous donation from Irv and Mel Himel, the sons of Ben and Edith, the unique, successful and proven educational philosophy of Bialik will soon benefit Jewish children living in York Region, home to the fastest growing Jewish population in the Diaspora.

When Bialik Hebrew Day School's northern campus – the Ben and Edith Himel Education Centre - opens its doors on The Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in September, 2013, it will be starting with a junior kindergarten, senior kindergarten, and Grade 1 class. Ultimately, the school will be able to accommodate 800 students and will include an Israel Interactive Centre, a fully equipped resource centre, an auditorium/gymnasium, an art room, and state-of-the-art technology.

The 50-acre Lebovic Campus, located on Bathurst Street, north of Rutherford Road, is an initiative of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Tomorrow Campaign, an unprecedented infrastructure initiative which is changing the Jewish landscape across the GTA.

"My mother and father are smiling today, and they will smile even more the minute Bialik North welcomes its first students," said Mel Himel. "While there are many wonderful people throughout Toronto's Jewish community who are committed to Jewish education, none of them are more committed than my father was. Our parents had many commitments in Jewish society, but their true passion was to Jewish education, Zionism and the state of Israel."

"Our Board is absolutely committed to ensuring that the children of York Region have access to a Bialik education as soon as possible," said Mark Nightingale, Past President, Board of Directors, Bialik. "This is real. This is happening. We anticipate no problems with the site approval and plan to have the first shovel in the ground this spring. Though spaces are still available at the moment, our current pace of applications indicates the demand will exceed the space we can now afford to build for September 2013. Therefore, community members have a unique opportunity at this moment. By investing here, they become leaders by directly increasing the number of kids in Jewish education. Together we are building the vibrancy of tomorrow's Jewish community."

"The fact that we, as a school, are able to replicate what our founders established 50 years ago is incredibly exciting," enthused Shana Harris, Head of School, Bialik. "And, this will not just be another school opening, families in York Region will be getting a school with a reputation for academic excellence, for teaching Ahavat Yisrael, and inspiring Jewish values and mentshlechkeit. These pillars, which, for the past 50 years, have guided us so successfully, now come with us to our new northern branch."

Part of the academic excellence synonymous with Bialik includes a rigorous dual curriculum which includes the study of Hebrew, English, Yiddish and French. Bialik provides a nurturing and engaging learning environment that fosters growth of students' academic, social and emotional skills.

For decades, Bialik has sent a high proportion of its graduates onward and upward to high school at TanenbaumCHAT's campus on Wilmington Avenue. Students who complete Grade 8 at Bialik's new Northern campus will, quite literally, move across the street to the Kimel Family Education Centre, also on the Lebovic Campus, for a seamless and convenient transition.

"We are absolutely delighted to welcome Bialik's new, northern facility onto the Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus," said UJA Federation President & CEO, Ted Sokolsky. "When Bialik north opens its doors in 2013 alongside TanenbaumCHAT's incredible Kimel Family Education Centre, the strategic educational role of the campus in support of Jewish education will move to a whole new level."

"My three children are all at Bialik and seeing, first-hand, the wonderful education they are getting there, and how their Jewish identity is developing, is truly remarkable," says Dr. Jodi Tanentzap, head of fundraising for the Bialik North Capital Campaign whose parents, community leaders Ed and Fran Sonshine have made a generous gift. "So, for me, being able to help bring that level of Jewish education to the children of York Region, and to see those families benefit from a Bialik education, is such a privilege."

And, when asked just what his parents might say to him if they were alive today, Irv Himel, a man known as much for his sense of humour as for his generosity and vision, looked skyward, threw his hands up, and said: "They'd say, you never listened to us when you were a kid, but now we're thrilled that our message apparently did get through to you!"

Yes, Ben and Edith, it certainly did, and, as a result, the children of York Region will soon benefit.

An architectural rendering takes us inside Bialik's northern campus, and its Israel Interactive Centre.

The past offers a message for today

Rabbi David Ellenson

As we reflect upon the lopsided exchange to free Gilad Schalit, it is instructive to remember that Israel has confronted the same excruciating question before. In 1985, the Jewish state had to decide whether to return 1,150 Palestinian and Lebanese prisoners for the release of three Israeli soldiers.

While the exchange never took place and the fate of the three Israelis remains unknown, two prominent Israeli rabbis – Shlomo Goren and Haim David Halevi – addressed the issue at that time. Their words then have resonance and meaning today, as they provide important perspectives on the position adopted by the current Israeli government in agreeing to this exchange.

Rabbi Goren served as chief Ashkenazi rabbi of Israel and was formerly chief rabbi of the Israel Defence Forces, while Rabbi Halevi was the chief Sephardi rabbi of Tel Aviv-Jaffa. Rabbi Goren, in an article written May 31, 1985, stated that Jewish law absolutely forbade the Israeli government from redeeming "our captive soldiers in exchange for 1,150 terrorists," and based his ruling on a talmudic passage that stated, "Captives should not be redeemed for more than their value."

Rabbi Goren emphasized his great distress at the personal plight of these captives. However, he insisted that the state should not redeem them, as an exchange for the release of known terrorists bent on the destruction of Israel and its Jewish population would surely imperil all Israeli citizens and fuel Arab attempts to capture more Jews in the future.

Rabbi Halevi, responding to Rabbi Goren soon after the article appeared, said he was sympathetic to the position advanced by his Ashkenazi colleague but disagreed with the conclusion. Rabbi Halevi said the conditions in a modern Jewish state were vastly different from those confronting the Jewish community when the talmudic passage was written. The Jewish people were now sovereign in their land, and the "political-national" aims that motivated the terrorists "to wreak havoc among the Jewish people" would continue, regardless of whether their prisoners were released in exchange for Israeli soldiers.

The "impossible choice" before the government, Rabbi Halevi said, was whether to "strengthen the power of the terrorists through the release of their comrades or to strengthen the morale of IDF soldiers should there be future wars." Rabbi Halevi believed the priority had to be the latter – the Israeli government should do all in its power to uphold the morale of the Israeli soldiers.

If a soldier, his family and all residents of the Jewish state knew the government would spare no effort or expense to liberate a captured soldier, and that such release had the highest governmental priority, then the resolve of the citizen-soldiers to defend their nation would be fortified.

In a moral universe where alternatives were limited and the military might of the State of Israel could protect its citizenry despite the preposterous numerical imbalance of the exchange, Rabbi Halevi felt this choice was the wisest one the government could make in an imperfect world.

In responding in this way, Rabbi Halevi provides a rationale for understanding why the current Israeli government made the decision on prisoner exchange. As its critics contend, it is a policy fraught with danger for the state. At the same time, it appears to be a policy that continues to guide Israel legitimately as it continues to provide unlimited support to its citizen-soldiers as they confront an enemy bent on the state's destruction.

Rabbi David Ellenson is the president of Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion.

Lessons from Steve Jobs

The saintly sage Rabbi Yisrael Meir Kagan (the Chafetz Chaim, 1838-1933) once commented that every technological innovation carries within it a moral message. As one who literally wrote the book on the laws of gossip and slander, he saw the invention of the telephone as teaching – warning perhaps – that what one says over here is heard over there. He would be kept very busy today with daily moral messages.

If a machine can teach morality, then we must learn much more from a person, especially one who in many ways redefined the world of technology. The untimely death of Apple co-founder Steve Jobs gives us much upon which to reflect. Coming just before Yom Kippur, it starkly demonstrated the frailty of man, that "who shall live and who shall die" must serve to motivate us. Once again it was shown for all to see the limitations of money, fame and power – something more noticeable when one dies before one's time.

To his credit, Jobs was well aware of the frailty of life and often spoke how the knowledge of death is what motivates him to live better, to be less concerned with what others thought of him and more so with what he must do.

To quote from his commencement address at Stanford University in 2005 "Because almost everything – all external expectations, all pride, all fear of embarrassment or failure – these things just fall away in the face of death, leaving only what is truly important."

Without realizing it, he beautifully explained the midrash that

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

"God saw that all was good," the pinnacle of the Creation story is in fact a reference to death. "And yet death is the destination we all share. No one has ever escaped it. And that is as it should be, because death is very likely the single best invention of life. It is life's change agent," Jobs said to the young university graduates embarking on life's journey.

But death is only one motivator. Jobs failed in much that he did. But his failures not only didn't deter him, they motivated him to work harder and keep going. As he himself testified, his success at Apple was rooted in the fact that he was fired from Apple, the company he started, years earlier. "I'm pretty sure none of this would have happened if I hadn't been fired from Apple."

Again, he displays insight into a rabbinic teaching that "great is the power of repentance, for it turns sins into merits." When one learns from the mistakes of one's past, using them to help launch a better future, those mistakes – we can call them sins – are actually the building blocks of success, of mitzvot. The sin is thus truly transformed into merit.

Our sages teach that God created and destroyed many worlds before creating this one. It's much harder for man to rebuild that to build from scratch. Yet rebuilding is the message God wants us to remember during the holiest time of the year. We have to keep building until our failures become a springboard for success. To once again quote Jobs, "Don't settle... So keep looking until you find it. Don't settle."

Local rabbis responded positively to women reciting Kaddish

Does Halachah forbid, allow or perhaps obligate a daughter to recite mourner's Kaddish in synagogue when one of her parents dies?

A Daughter's Recitation of Mourner's Kaddish, a source book to be published in the next weeks by the Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance (JOFA) as part of its Halakhic Source Guide Series, addresses this question. It was written by Rahel Berkovits, who teaches Mishnah, Talmud and Halachah at the Pardes Institute for Jewish Studies in Jerusalem.

The sympathies of JOFA and of Berkovits are not in doubt – they are very supportive of a daughter's reciting Kaddish – yet the volume is not a passionate plea for that position. Instead, Berkovits has carefully collected primary sources with a variety of approaches to the issue.

All sources are texts written by rabbis in the last millennium, mostly responsa (rabbis' published answers to questions submitted to them) from the last 200 years. Most of the 50 texts are written in difficult Hebrew. Berkovits provides the Hebrew original of each text, a readable and accurate English translation in the opposite column and a dispassionate explanation of the legal thinking behind each text.

The book shows that from the earliest days of the practice of saying Kaddish for a deceased parent, around 1,000 years ago, it was understood that a male under the age of 13 was permitted to lead the Kaddish. This indicates that the mourner's Kaddish is different from other sections of the service that, according to standard traditional Halachah, must be led by a male over the age of majority.

The book also shows that up until the last few centuries, only one mourner recited the mourner's Kaddish in synagogue. Acrimonious competition sometimes broke out among mourners for the right to lead the prayer. The earliest opinions that forbade women from reciting Kaddish come from this period. Now that the (almost universal) custom is that many mourners recite Kaddish together, the case for permitting women to recite it becomes stronger.

Nevertheless, most of the Hebrew sources in this book actually forbid the practice or at least seriously restrict it (e.g., by suggesting that a daughter might recite Kaddish at a service held in a private home, but not in synagogue, or that a daughter might recite Kaddish only if her parent had no surviving son).

Still the book subtly shows that most of the rabbinic arguments against women saying Kaddish are not based on real halachic concerns but on public policy considerations. The first rabbi who directly addressed in a responsum the question of a daughter saying Kaddish, Rabbi Yair Bachrach (1638-1702), at first rehearsed the reasons why the practice ought to be permissible, but then backtracked. He argued that allowing an innovation like this would lead to a situation where "each person will build an altar for himself according to his own logic and the words of the rabbis will be seen as laughter and jokes and people will mock them."

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

Later Orthodox rabbis explicitly wrote that they opposed this innovation since any change in synagogue practice would strengthen the hands of non-Orthodox Jewish denominations. Toward the end of the book, Berkovits quotes one of the few leading Orthodox rabbis who actually committed a lenient opinion on the issue to writing, Rabbi Aaron Soloveichik of Chicago (1917-2001), who turned that logic on its head. He argued that Orthodox rabbis have to allow women to say Kaddish since when they forbid the practice, the hands of Reform and Conservative Judaism are strengthened.

I learned much from this book, and I was struck by a few thoughts as I read it. We have certainly come a long way in the last few decades. We now have a small cadre of learned women such as Berkovits, highly trained in the study of halachic texts, who are able to assemble collections of difficult rabbinic texts and make them available to a larger audience. In fact, community rabbis may be those who will benefit most from this collection, which is not meant for the casual reader.

We have also come a long way in the last few decades on many women's issues. When I was growing up in Toronto, it was virtually unheard of to find a woman saying Kaddish in any Orthodox synagogue, and even in the Conservative synagogue where my family prayed it was an unusual sight. Now in all synagogues outside of haredi circles, women recite Kaddish regularly. In an appendix to her book, Berkovits dramatically demonstrates this recent change of attitude by juxtaposing the original position (from 1969) of Rabbi Maurice Lamm's The Jewish Way in Death and Mourning on women reciting Kaddish, and his changed position in the book's last reprint, in 2000. (Rabbi Lamm is a leading modern Orthodox rabbi, and his book is seen as the authority on laws of mourning by Jews of many denominations.) In 1969, he was decidedly cool to the idea; in the 2000 revision he writes movingly about the "need to empower women religiously," to "encourage women's participation in synagogue life" and "to allow women to express their innermost spiritual yearnings in a traditional mode" by saying Kaddish for a deceased parent.

How did this change occur? A careful reading of Berkovits' book proves that it was not initiated by the so-called gedolei ha-posekim (the leading Torah scholars of the world who have expertise in halachic texts that allegedly eclipses that of local community rabbis). Aside from Rabbi Soloveichik, perhaps the only gadol (leading Torah scholar) who explicitly wrote to permit a daughter's Kaddish (albeit in a limited manner) was Rabbi Yosef Eliyahu Henkin (1880-1973).

Change has come about in Orthodox circles through facts on the ground, through decisions of local rabbis who responded positively when women congregants asked to say Kaddish, and occasionally even encouraged women to do so. (Berkovits collects in her final chapter many anecdotes of permissive attitudes to women saying Kaddish in contemporary American synagogues and even in Europe before World War II.) In other words, the book proves – for those requiring such proof – that when solid halachic arguments based on texts are available, Orthodox Judaism develops and changes because of grassroots initiatives more often than because of public decisions of the leading Torah scholars of the generation.

Jewish cemetery rededicated in Poland

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

A small town in Poland was reminded of its Jewish past recently.

Last month, a group of Jews from Toronto, the United States and Israel who have ancestral roots in the region went to Tarlow to participate in a special rededication ceremony to mark the restoration of its Jewish cemetery.

Before the Holocaust, Tarlow, 150 kilometres south of Warsaw, was home to 3,000 Jews, who comprised about 70 per cent of its population. Almost all of them were deported to the nearby Ozarow ghetto on Oct. 15, 1942. Then they were murdered in the Treblinka death camp. Today, not a single known Jew lives in Tarlow.

The cemetery itself was vandalized, first probably by Nazis and then by local inhabitants, who hauled away tombstones to use in an assortment of construction projects.

Eli Rubenstein, the Toronto-based national director of March of Living Canada, attended last month's ceremony in Tarlow.

Dr. Jan Curylo

Eli Rubinstein

Norman Weinberg

Rubenstein decided to attend after receiving a note from Norman Weinberg, executive co-ordinator of the Poland Jewish Cemeteries Restoration Project.

Weinberg, whose organization restores rundown Jewish cemeteries in Poland, informed Rubenstein that Jews with family ties to Tarlow and Ozarow were planning to rededicate cemeteries there.

Weinberg's note arrived at a propitious moment. As Rubenstein put it, "My father passed away earlier this year, and I was thinking of how best to honour him when, suddenly, this opportunity came my way."

He added, "My great grandfather, Elijah, whom I'm named after, lived and died in Tarlow. My grandfather, Nehemiah, was born in Tarlow in 1888 and immigrated to Canada in 1913. He never forgot his roots and kept in constant contact with his home country."

Given his family's connection to Tarlow, Rubenstein felt duty-bound to make a small donation to the restoration of the Jewish cemetery and sponsor a five-year scholarship fund for 15 local students who would be invited to write essays about Jewish life in prewar Poland or the Holocaust.

"I wanted to honour the past and encourage Tarlow's new generation – whose members had probably never met a Jewish person – to become familiar with the now-lost people who once walked the very streets of their town, whose coat of arms even today bears a Star of David beside the cross."

But long before Rubenstein ever set foot in Tarlow, a local cardiologist, Dr. Jan Curylo, began gathering fragments of Jewish tombstones and depositing them in the cemetery and near the mass grave of Jews who had been shot by the Nazis.

Prior to its restoration, the cemetery was nothing more than an empty field with no monuments visible, said Weinberg. "Dr. Curylo, out of a deep sense of respect, carefully collected, stored and thereby saved as many monuments as he could."

Curylo was born in 1944 in a town close to Tarlow. "There were no Jewish children where he grew up," Rubenstein said, "but his family had great respect for the Jewish people, and he had always felt tremendous pain for the tragic fate of Poland's Jewish population."

Ethnic cleansing in Nubian Mountains

— Another Darfur? —

Norman L. Epstein

The eyes of women and children streaming into refugee camps reveal the searing trauma just witnessed. They have seen their villages razed to the ground, with pockets of smoke billowing from charred huts. They have seen corpses of loved ones, friends and neighbours with their throats slit or mutilated beyond recognition. Is this the re-enactment of the senseless saga in Darfur? Sadly no.

Guest Voice

Norman Epstein

Despite the unremitting violence in Darfur, this disturbing vignette encapsulates the recent vicious onslaught by the government of Sudan against the Nubian people, an African tribe in South Kordofan (also known as Nuba Mountains), a region bordering North Sudan and the new sovereign state of South Sudan.

This is not the first time the Nubian people have had to withstand the malicious wrath of the Khartoum regime. In the early 1990s, the government of Sudan systematically attacked and killed close to 200,000 Nubians, arguably called a genocide by many. In the current episode, no one knows the actual numbers murdered, as unfettered access together with humanitarian aid has been denied.

However, numerous witnesses have consistently verified that mass atrocities are taking place. As well, a leaked United Nations report also corroborates these accounts. Moreover, satellite photos clearly illustrate the location of mass graves.

So as the Arab Spring sprung with uninterrupted press coverage, the Sudan summer recoiled with yet another episode of ethnic cleansing of a marginalized African tribe. Unfortunately, it barely registered a blip on the media's radar.

President Omar Al Bashir of North Sudan has called for South Kordofan to be "ethnically cleansed" of African people. His ruthless regime has perpetrated repeated crimes against marginalized Africans — the Dingka and Nuer in the south, the Nubians and the Fur, Masseleit and Zaghawa in Darfur. In recent days, the attacks have extended into the Blue Nile.

He has been indicted by the International Criminal Court for crimes against humanity for orchestrating the well-documented genocide in Darfur. Yet when the south officially seceded and became a sovereign country on July 9, 2011, he stood among dignitaries in Juba, as though he is a credible man of peace and reconciliation. However, the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) signed between the north and south tenuously hangs by a thread.

The disputed region of Abeyei, which contains significant oil resources, was supposed to have had a referendum to determine whether this region would be incorporated in North or South Sudan. The area is populated mostly by Dingka African tribes, loyal to the south, and the north has postponed the referendum over the dubious contention that a nomadic Arab tribe, the Misseriya, loyal to the regime, should be permitted to vote. The government of Sudan has violently secured the area despite the promise of Ethiopian peacekeepers moving in. Hair-trigger tensions have precipitated episodic violence between the north and south that could explode into a full-scale conflagration, once more.

There is a pretence that Bashir and his regime are part of the solution, but in fact they are the source of the problem. The regime's duplicity is well-known to long-time observers. It has signed peace treaties demonstrating little desire to implement them completely and participates in peace talks that it has tried to sabotage. The Doha peace process in Qatar to end the conflict in Darfur has been an abysmal failure.

Regardless, the international community sends a constant parade of envoys carrying "carrots" to engage the Khartoum regime. When will enough be enough? When will the world finally stand up to this cabal of serial genocidaires? When will the world wield the proverbial stick to rein in this regime's egregious behaviour?

Jews need to be the canary in the coal mine. Jews were in vanguard of the Darfur movement – partly from lessons learned from the Holocaust and partly due to a collective remorse of the international community's negligence in Rwanda a decade before. Moreover, IsraAID and Jewish humanitarian groups are donating significant resources to help rebuild the infrastructure of the fledgling republic of South Sudan.

One tombstone found in Jewish cemetery

Ten years ago, on All Saints Day, when Polish Catholics customarily visit and clean up tombstones belonging to their families, Curylo visited the neglected Jewish cemetery in Tarlow and found only one lone tombstone.

Saddened by its forlorn appearance, he vowed to restore the cemetery as best he could. In addition, he went house to house, gathering tombstones that had been carried off by its residents after the war and bringing them back to the cemetery.

Rubenstein and Weinberg also participated in the restoration of the cemetery.

Weinberg, a former Torontonian who lives in Sarasota, Fla., donated funds for a fence and gates, while Rubenstein contributed money for a memorial monument.

Last month's ceremony drew the mayor of Tarlow, the vice-governor of the Swietokkrzyskie region, local priests, the chief rabbi of Poland, Michael Schudrich, the current Ozawer rebbe, Tanchum Becker, who lives in Israel, and school children from the area.

Rubenstein noted that the older residents of Tarlow were eager to share their memories of their former Jewish neighbours.

"One elderly woman said she cried when the last Jewish girl in Tarlow moved to Israel. A little Polish girl came up to me and, with the most eager look in her eyes, asked if it would be possible to meet Jewish boys and girls her own age."

When the delegation of overseas Jews left Tarlow, many of its elderly residents waved good-bye from the side of the road. "They had the most beautiful smiles I had seen in a long time," recalled Rubenstein.

"It's never too late to do the right thing, in our own personal lives and in the national lives of a people. In Dr. Curylo, we have an example of a person who is trying to repair the wrongs of the past."

It's important to set an example and inspire people to do the right thing, he observed. People who had desecrated "a sacred burial ground" after the war were now playing a positive role in an attempt to heal old wounds.

Weinberg said there are from 1,200 to 1,400 Jewish cemeteries in Poland in dire need of renovation.

The Polish government protects and, in some cases, cleans these cemeteries, but it's not funding full restorations.

Five years ago, a petition was sent to the German government urging it to assume responsibility for Nazi Germany's crimes and pay its fair share of the costs of restoring Jewish cemeteries in Poland.

Weinberg and a delegation of Jews presented this petition to the German ambassador in Poland last month. The envoy was responsive, asking them to form a committee to discuss ways in which Germany can be helpful.

Israel a safe haven

The Jewish state has been a safe haven for scores of Sudanese refugees escaping the incessant violence in their native country, as well as the deplorable treatment and discrimination of the Egyptians where they initially sought asylum.

There is much that can be done stave off the deteriorating crisis. Certainly a limited no-fly zone should be considered in South Kordofan if mass atrocities continue. Are not African lives just as worthy as Libyan lives? The UN Missions in Sudan (UNMIS) peacekeeping force, should have its mandate strengthened to Chapter VII of the UN Charter (action with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression) to intervene proactively to save lives – instead of mere observers and reacting post hoc.

Most importantly and urgently, economic measures should be tried first. The government of Sudan has a foreign debt reportedly in excess of $30 billion with a promise by the International Monetary Fund to forgive it. The IMF could threaten to rescind this if there is not a cessation of hostilities. A blockade of the Port of Sudan could prevent the shipping of Sudan's oil exports, a major source of revenue. Intense pressure must be exerted on China, who has been the main benefactor of Sudan's oil and a commercial lifeline to the regime.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper has said that Canada "will not lead from the bleachers" and has not been reticent in taking principled stands. Canada could coalesce the international community of other like-minded countries and co-ordinate such a bold initiative. Thousands of African lives hang in the balance. Is it not the time to act with resolve to end the interminable suffering of the people of Sudan?

Gay speed-dating events gain momentum

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Jewish singles events are a dime a dozen in Toronto – for straight people.

But Justine Apple – executive director of Kulanu Toronto, a social group for Jewish bisexual, gay, lesbian, transgendered, transexual and intersexed people – is working to provide Jews of all sexual orientations with the same opportunities to meet potential partners.

Justine Apple

On Nov. 10, Kulanu will host speed-daters who are looking for love, friendship and community.

This will be just the second gay speed-dating event in Kulanu's 11-year history, the first of which was held last February.

Similar to the format from the last event, participants will be separated by sex and age. The men and women will each have a group of 19-to-34-year-old speed daters, and there will be groups for the over-35 crowd.

After participants register, they'll be given a name tag, a number and instructions about how the program will work.

Each couple will "date" for four minutes before moving on to the next participant, and they'll be given a form to let organizers know which dater they'd be happy to hear from after the event.

Apple said the participants must register by 7:30 p.m. on the day of the event, because once the program begins, latecomers won't be able to join midway through.

Until this year, Kulanu was partially funded by Hillel of Greater Toronto, but although Kulanu is no longer funded by Hillel, the Jewish campus organization continues to support the group and offered up its downtown space, the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, for the event.

Kulanu is currently kept afloat by private donations, membership fees and cover charges.

For the upcoming speed-dating event, Congregation Darchei Noam and Temple Emanu-El agreed to be sponsors.

Apple said she's reached out to other local synagogues and Jewish community organizations to help spread the word about the event.

"We approached them this year, and because they have heard of us and because this is the second opportunity to talk to them, they were more open to helping us out. It's gaining momentum."

Apple said the firstspeed-dating event attracted more than 60 people, and she expects even more next month.

"We hope for more people this time, but we have a cut-off of 80... because that's capacity. But our hope is to get more people than we did in February and see some new faces."

Apple said she anticipates the program will be a success, based on the feedback from the last one.

"I heard the event being talked about for months after... Many people have said it was their favourite Kulanu event so far... People were asking, 'So when is the next one?'"

More important than providing opportunities for gay Jews to make love connections, Apple said she strives to create an inclusive and welcoming atmosphere.

"We want a place where they can feel welcome and where they can feel safe... I feel we serve a vital need in the community."

In response to the countless news stories of gay youth being mercilessly bullied, leading some to commit suicide, Apple said it's important for people to utilize support groups that are out there.

"You just shouldn't give up hope, and it's important that they reach out to someone in their lives. It could be a friend, a family member, someone at a helpline... or a social service worker, or therapist," she said.

"They really need to reach out and talk to that person because I think if they have one person in their life that they can trust and talk to, they'll get through it." To become a member or check out future events, visit www.kulanutoronto.ca.

Schalit swap changes little in Middle East

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Beyond the extensive reporting early last week of the long-awaited, emotional return of Gilad Schalit to Israel and to his family – beyond the scenes of celebrations in the West Bank and Gaza over the return of Palestinian prisoners, scores of whom murdered and maimed hundreds of Israeli civilians, and beyond even reports about the radical disparity in the exchange of more than 1,000 Palestinians for "just" one Israeli soldier – there were some efforts to look at what this human drama means in broader political terms.

For instance, on cbc.ca (Oct. 17), Sasa Petricic had an "analysis" piece, "Who gains from Israel's prisoner swap with Hamas?" Whereas too many "analysis" items, in all branches of the media, are infected with personal opinion, or even pronounced bias, Petricic delivered an impartial overview.

He noted that changes in the region, in particular in Egypt, gave Israel a window to conclude the Schalit deal while the Egyptian military, still in control of the country, was willing, in this one case, to help secure the deal with Hamas. Otherwise, as Petricic put it, "these days, the Egyptian army isn't even able – or perhaps willing – to protect Israel's embassy in the heart of Cairo from anti-Israeli anger, a sentiment that could become official policy once a new Egyptian government is elected."

Indeed, the outcome of elections scheduled for next month could lead to the emergence of the Muslim Brotherhood and other even more extreme Islamists so bitterly hostile to Israel as to make any similar deal in the future unachievable.

As to Hamas itself, Petricic observed that the Islamist organization had become weakened while Fatah grew more popular following Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' popular bid for Palestinian statehood recognition last month at the United Nations, even if that move hasn't yielded any concrete results. Now, with the release of Palestinian prisoners into Hamas' hands, that group's fortunes have suddenly shot up. But just how long the effect will last is unpredictable.

One important factor that Petricic didn't comment on is the reason for the downturn over the past several months in Hamas' position in Gaza, which led it to want to conclude a deal at this time, and why it also relented on some of its previous demands for Schalit's release: Syria.

Not only has Syria's president, Bashar Assad, one of Hamas' principal supporters, been hurt by the revolts spreading throughout his country, even Iran, the main backer of both Syria and Hamas, has seen its influence in the region diminished (while Turkey's grows). There are reports that, subsequently, Iran has cut back substantially on the financial aid it's giving Hamas, and even that Hamas' "political bureau," long situated in Damascus, might be relocated, possibly to Cairo.

It can, therefore, be argued that if any party has come out "ahead" in this exchange, it has been Egypt. Yet that, too, as mentioned, could be transient, depending on what transpires in the coming months, during which both parliamentary and presidential elections and the drafting of a new constitution are slated to take place.

Ironically, almost at the very moment when Israel found itself praising Egypt for its crucial role in securing Schalit's release, others were condemning Egypt's military rulers for their brutal crackdown on Coptic protesters who had been peacefully demonstrating against the authorities' indifference to the burning and destruction of their churches by Muslim extremists. The military's response resulted in the deaths of more than 20 Coptic Christians and elicited outrage abroad. If nothing else, what Egypt achieved last week provided a much-needed, if temporary, public relations boost.

In the final analysis, as Middle East analyst Aaron David Miller cautioned in a piece he wrote for Foreign Policy on Oct. 13, no one should read too much into the prisoner exchange. It should be seen as an arrangement, controversial as it was, that "changes almost nothing in the broader Israeli-Palestinian conflict." The same could be said for its impact on the region.

UJA Federation board of directors nominees

Alan Winer, nominating committee chair for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, has announced the nominees for the board of directors and individual representative council members.

Elections will be held during UJA Federation's annual meeting on Monday, Nov. 28, 2011, at 7 p.m. at the Lipa Green Centre for Jewish Community Services (4600 Bathurst St., Toronto).

In accordance with the bylaws, the governance consists of a council, a board of directors and an executive committee. The board of directors, the chair and the senior vice-chair will be elected by the council members. The executive committee will be ratified by the board of directors from among the directors. No nominations can be made from the floor during the annual meeting. However, any member of the Jewish community may be placed in nomination by complying with the following bylaws:

"In order to be elected or appointed and to continue as a council member, each individual must (a) be an individual general member; (b) have made a financial commitment to the United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto in respect of the most recent annual campaign and be in good standing with the United Jewish Appeal in respect of such commitment; and (c) shall not have refused to remove any barrier that is within his or her control that would prevent his or her spouse's religious re-marriage.

"Each individual representative council member shall be elected at an annual general meeting by the individual general members from among the qualified candidates duly nominated therefor by the nominating committee or nominated by any seven individual general members; provided that in respect of nominations made by individual general members: (a) No individual general members may nominate more than three nominees for election as individual representative council member at any annual general meeting; (b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and (c) such nominations shall be delivered to the secretary at least 21 days before the annual general meeting in which the election is to occur."

Nominated for chair of the board is Elizabeth Wolfe and senior vice-chair of the board is Richard Venn. Nominees for the board of directors include:

For a two-year term:

Leslie Gales, Cecil Brauer, Jill Goldberg-Reitman, Leo Goldhar, Lou Greenbaum, Edward Kholodenko, Warren Kimel, Elyse Lackie, David Mansell, Robert Palter, David Peltz, Craig Rimer, Lionel Robins, Ralph Shedletsky, Honey Sherman, Keith Ray.

For a one-year term:

Barbara Bank, Sheldon Goodman, Bruce Leboff, Gilbert Palter, Felicia Posluns, Ariella Rohringer, Laurie Sheff .

Continuing their two-year term:

Jeffrey Cohen, Michael Diamond, David Dulberg, Sara Gottlieb, Sarena Koschitzky, Glennie Lindenberg, Bev Lyons, Steve Mayer, Ran Mesterman, Morris Perlis, Wendy Posluns, Elan Pratzer, Randy Shiff, Alan Winer.

The following are to be elected for a two-year term 2011-2013 as individual representative council members:

Elena Aleinikov, Stephen Altbaum, Barbara Bank, Brent Belzberg, Austin Beutel, Cecil Brauer, Morley Brown, Michael Buckstein, Samuel H. Cohen, Sharon Cohen, Stephen Cole, Richard Diamond, Sheldon Disenhouse, William Draimin, Lisa Draper, Wendy Eisen, Ruth Ekstein, David Engel, Judy Engel, Michael Florence, Leslie Gales, Leo Goldhar, Sheldon Goodman, David C. Green, David Y. Green, Robert Harlang, Alison Himel, Edward Kholodenko, Warren Kimel, David Koschitzky, Sarena Koschitzky, Elyse Lackie, Bruce Leboff, Joseph Lebovic, David Mansell, Ira Marder, Steven Mayer, Karen Morton, Robert Palter, David Peltz, Sarah Perlis, Felicia Posluns, Elan Pratzer, Keith Ray, Craig Rimer, Ariella Rohringer, Jeff Rosenthal, Ralph Shedletsky, Honey Sherman, Randy Shiff, Eileen Silver, Miguel Singer, David Spiro, Elaine Todres, Richard Venn, Dodi Weill, Alan Winer, Elizabeth Wolfe, Henry Wolfond

In addition to the individual representatives listed, each group general member of the federation shall be entitled to two representatives on the council (group representative council members). Any group general member that has a membership in good standing in excess of 100 persons residing in the Greater Toronto Area shall be entitled to one additional group representative on the council. According to the bylaws of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, organizations and associations may apply to become group general members by submitting an application that confirms that it subscribes to the objects of the UJA Federation, and promotes the United Jewish Appeal annual campaign. Applications for group general membership were solicited via mail in September 2011. All group general members must be registered with UJA Federation by Oct. 7, 2011.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Israeli university accepted in Concordia contest

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — For the second year in a row, Israel will participate in Concordia University's international contest for master of business administration students.

Ben-Gurion University of the Negev (BGU) became the first Israeli institution to send a team to the John Molson MBA International Case Competition in the event's history. It will do so again for the upcoming competition, Jan. 3 to 8 at the Fairmount Queen Elizabeth Hotel.

In fact, BGU was the first Middle Eastern country to take part in the competition, which was launched 30 years ago and has been international since 1992. It describes itself as the oldest and largest MBA case competition in the world.

Last year, 36 teams from 11 countries vied for first-, second- and third-place cash prizes for their schools. Teams must apply to compete and are selected by the organizers – students.

The BGU team this year finished tied for the 10th spot.

Working as a team, the students are asked to solve hypothetical problems that businesses today might experience. Business executives or consultants act as judges.

The students or their schools are responsible for their travel and other expenses.

The Canadian Associates of BGU hopes to raise funds to cover all of the Israeli team's expenses, said Amy Leitner, the Montreal chapter's executive director.

One of the associates' supporters, Arnold Echenberg, was a judge in the 2010 competition and thought it would be a good idea to encourage BGU to apply.

BGU's MBA program was developed in co-operation with Columbia University and offers a regular two-year course of study, as well as a 13-month honours program taught in English.

In May, the BGU team from the honours program tied for first place with Tel Aviv University in the Sofaer International Case Competition in Israel. For the first time, the competition was opened up to the world, with four Israeli and nine teams from abroad, including Columbia, Cambridge University and the University of California at Los Angeles.

French Yiddish lit prof spends semester at U of T

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

One of the world's leading specialists on Yiddish literature, Prof. Jean Baumgarten from Paris' École des hautes études en sciences sociales, is in Toronto this fall sharing his expertise with University of Toronto students and the city's Jewish community.

Baumgarten was invited by U of T's Centre for Jewish Studies to be the Shoshana Shier Distinguished Visiting Lecturer, the featured speaker in the centre's annual public lecture series that runs until December.

He's also teaching two courses at the downtown campus and doing research.

"Last year, I gave a lecture at the Centre for Jewish Studies at U of T on the traditions of the sifrei minhagim – the book of customs – in old Yiddish literature," explained Baumgarten, who is also the director of Frances' national scientific research centre.

"After they asked me if I would like to come to teach old Yiddish literature, because it is not a very well-known field in North America, and students were interested in knowing more about the field."

Baumgarten, who is an expert on old Yiddish literature, popular Jewish religion and culture, Jewish languages, and the cultural history of Ashkenazi Jewry from the Middle Ages to the 18th century, agreed to spend the semester at U of T to teach two courses.

"One is on Chassidism, the origins of Chassidim… to explain how this religious movement appeared and the origin of this mystical movement in eastern Europe. It's an introduction to Chassidut. It's based on the study of chassidic texts," he explained.

Jean Baumgarten

"I teach another course on the history of the old Yiddish literature and the relation between popular Jewish literature and Ashkenazi society."

In addition to teaching the courses, Baumgarten is presenting a three-part lecture series at U of T's University College called "Do We Find Mystical Texts in Old Yiddish Literature?"

His first lecture, presented on Oct 24, focused on texts that are not well known – such as The Nahalat Tsvi, an adaptation of the Zohar in Yiddish – and translating them into the vernacular.

"This lecture is on the translation of the Zohar in Yiddish and not only the content, but also for which readers this text was translated and adapted," Baumgarten said.

On Oct. 31, he'll share his thoughts on "Narrative, Ethical, and Mystical Texts in Old Yiddish."

"It's on the ethical and mystical traditions in Yiddish, based also on tales, mystical stories translated into Yiddish, and also ethical books for men and women connected to Shabtai Tzvi," a 17th-century rabbi and kabbalist who claimed to be the Messiah.

"It is interesting to study these texts, which are not very well known, and to see the relational links between these old Yiddish texts and Shabtai Tzvi," Baumgarten said.

The following week, his final lecture, titled "Some Echoes of Shabtai Tzvi in Old Yiddish Literature," will explore texts "about the diffusion and the reaction of the rabbinic authorities to this heretical movement and the consequence of the diffusion of these texts in Ashkenazi society."

Baumgarten said he's also committed to furthering his personal research on popular Jewish culture and literature in the pre-modern period from the 16th to 18th century during his semester in Toronto.

Prof. Naomi Sarig, an art historian from Tel Aviv University, is working with Baumgarten on a translation of a first edition of a sefer minhagim by Shimon Ben Yehuda Halevi Guenzburg.

"It was printed in the 16th century in Venice and diffused in western and central Europe up the 18th century. We are doing a translation with a long introduction to the book," Baumgarten said.

"Also, in this edition, there are marvelous wooden engravings representing many domestic events and also at the synagogue. So it is an interesting representation of Jewish life in 16th to 18th centuries."

Sarig will be using her extensive knowledge of art history to study the relationship between the images and illustrations, and the text.

Baumgarten, whose academic obligations are keeping him occupied, said that on a personal level, he hopes to learn more about Toronto's Jewish community.

He said that despite his past visits to Toronto and his current four-month stay, he recognizes that he still has much to learn about the community.

"I've met a lot of friends and people involved with the community, but I'm not very well-informed about Jewish life in Toronto," he said. "This is a very good opportunity to learn more and to be in touch with Jews from Toronto."

Jerusalem student group to reinvent itself

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Yavneh Olami, a Jerusalem-based international student organization that promotes Zionism and Israel advocacy, is working to reinvent itself on Canadian campuses.

Beth Zalcman, Yavneh Olami's programs co-ordinator, said over the past few years, like many other Jewish non-profit organizations, Yavneh Olami suffered from budget cuts and had to scale back on programming, but now she's hoping the Zionist student organization will be able to re-establish itself on North American campuses.

"We're hoping to revitalize the chapters that we once had. I don't know if it's going to happen overnight, but it's definitely in the works," Zalcman said.

The goal, she added, is that Yavneh Olami will add something to the Jewish campus landscape.

She said her staff is currently focusing on developing chapters on North American campuses, including University of Toronto, York University and McGill University, but they do have ambitions to expand to Europe as well.

At first, Zalcman said, the campus presence will be a subtle one.

"We will be looking for students who may have been involved with our programs in the past who might want to be involved – even if it's just posting a flyer about a program."

Some of the programs Yavneh Olami runs focus on hasbarah, promoting aliyah and encouraging students to take leadership roles.

This past summer, 12 Canadian students joined Yavneh Olami's six-week summer internship program, which enables students and recent graduates to take on internships in Israel.

Zalcman said she hopes more Canadian students will opt to join the organization's 10-day Winter Israel Mission from Dec. 25 to Jan. 3.

About 50 Jewish youths are expected to join the mission, which will travel to conflict "hot spots," including areas in Judea and Samaria and the northern border.

"Given the whole political climate, it's very hard to find positive images of Israel in the world… We wanted to reaffirm what they learned when they went to pro-Israel schools. We want to show them that the things you're hearing in the media are not correct. [We want to show them] what it's really like," Zalcman said.

She said she's working on adding Bar Ilan University's annual conference to the itinerary and anticipates that the participants will have many opportunities throughout the mission to meet with Israeli public figures and dignitaries.

"It's going to be more on the political side."

Sunday Funday

Campus Life

Jessica Pollock

Some of the best ideas often develop in the most unexpected ways, and the Sunday Funday initiative is no exception.

When a group of friends from Vancouver attending the University of Western Ontario (UWO) began their Sunday evening potluck dinners in the fall of 2010, they were unaware of the impact this practice would have on the London community at large.

One Sunday early in the school year, in an effort to extend the weekend, the native Vancouverites gathered a large group of their friends to engage in interesting discussion and enjoy a diverse selection of comfort food.

Since they were attending university in the east, far from their homes, this dinner seemed like a great way to capture a homelike atmosphere.

Soon, the one-time dinner became a successful weekly ritual and acted as a forum for bringing together a large number of people in an informal and relaxed setting. The students involved would even sacrifice studying time or prior commitments to attend the potluck dinners.

As the harsh winter months set in, this devoted group of students realized how fortunate they were: they could receive a post-secondary education on the other side of the country and indulge in dinners and lively discussions every week in the company of like-minded individuals.

After one Sunday dinner, the group decided to take leftovers from the potluck to give to the homeless. Although they had no luck finding anyone in need that night, the very attempt sparked the inspiration to add a more charitable purpose to their dinners.

In keeping with the Jewish value of tzedakah, the original group of friends decided to encourage other groups to create their own "dinner teams." This movement multiplied rapidly as scores of groups emerged and ran their own Sunday dinners.

There's only one catch for other students hosting or attending the Sunday potlucks: every individual is required to bring one non-perishable food item that will then be donated to the London Food Bank.

Each host house is given an empty box to be filled with the items that attendees contribute.

"The box is also there to remind students of issues outside of the university bubble, and to hopefully set the context for discussion," says Harrison Glotman, co-leader of the initiative.

UWO students turned their Sunday Funday potluck dinners into an opportunity to donate food to the London Food Bank.

In the first month after the weekly dinners were expanded, 350 pounds of food were donated to the local food bank in an effort to help the needy. Since that first potluck in February, hundreds of pounds of food items have been donated.

This year, the original leaders are planning to double the team involvement at UWO and spread Sunday Funday to more Canadian schools. By bringing passionate young adults together in a spirited and benevolent environment, they hope to stimulate them and find even more ways to give back to the community at large.

I look forward to participating in upcoming Sunday Funday dinners, and I encourage you to do the same! For more information about how to get involved with Sunday Funday or to initiate your own dinner team, visit the website at www.sunday-funday.ca.

ISRAEL TENNIS

Now serving 21,500 kids weekly - thanks to

Established in 1976, the Israel Tennis Centers / Israel Children's Centres have been promoting the social, psychological and physical development of Israeli youth for 35 years.

21,500 kids participate weekly in programs that give EVERY Israeli child, regardless of background, religion, socioeconomic status or ability, a chance to become a champion - at tennis - but more important - in LIFE. Located from Kiryat Shmona in the north of Israel to Beer Sheva in the south, most of the 14 Israel Tennis Centers are located in economically-challenged neighborhoods and outlying development towns throughout Israel.

The ITC's Arab/Jewish Co-Existence Program, Kindergarten, Immigrant Assimilation Initiatives, and programs for the Developmentally and Physically Challenged focus on tolerance and the virtues of teamwork, using the game of tennis as a framework. The fact that the ITC turns out world class Israeli tennis champions is a fortunate and exciting by-product. Every Israeli kid can be a champion, given the chance.

Israel's Elad Gevandschnaider wins Silver and Bronze medals in Special Olympics European Summer Games

July 2011, Athens, Greece. Elad Gevandschnaider, Beer Sheva, had two new reasons to celebrate his birthday this summer. Elad, who was born with Down Syndrome, has been participating in the Israel Tennis Centers Special Needs program for 5 years.

Originally sent to his local Israel Tennis Center in Beer Sheva by his physical education teacher at school, Elad represented Israel in the European games this summer, and won a silver medal in singles, and a bronze medal in doubles.

Elad's is but one ITC story. There are 21,000+ more. To learn more, go to www.israeltenniscentres.org

Jews urged to donate organs, tissues

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

A recent panel of Toronto rabbis urged Jews to give the gift of life by becoming organ and tissue donors.

Sponsored by National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section (NCJW-TS), the panel included rabbis Reuven Bulka, chairman of the board of the Trillium Gift of Life Program; Aaron Flanzraich and Tina Grimberg.

After an introduction by Rabbi Bulka, Ronnie Gavise, president and CEO of Trillium Gift of Life Network, said that 1,543 people are on the waiting list in Ontario for an organ donation, and Ontarians are five times more likely to need a transplant than to be a donor.

"Every day here, someone dies waiting for an organ," Gavise said.

Rabbi Flanzraich said his interest in organ donations began years ago, when families would call him to ask what they should do about a loved one who was dying.

"They became shocked when I told them they could donate their organs. They were under the misconception that Jews could not donate their organs," he said.

One of the big problems about getting organ donors, Rabbi Flanzraich said, is that "people pass the buck. They think that someone else will do it. In Israel, people who are signed on as organ donors are bumped up the list if they need an organ."

He is frustrated, he said, that only 20 per cent of Ontarians are donors. "It is a tragedy that [the number] is so low.

"No matter how eloquently we speak about it, the message just isn't taking hold."

Rabbi Bulka said a major misconception is that Jews must be buried whole. "That is a value, but there's a hierarchy of values, and nothing is higher than saving lives."

One of the solutions, he said, is to educate the children. "I believe it's a generational issue. It might come down to our children asking us [to donate.]

"We need to [tell] our children that it is not only permitted, but an absolute requirement. If it is permitted, it is a choice, and this is not a choice."

Also speaking was Mindy Halpern who "compulsively and spontaneously donated" a kidney to Chaya Levenson, who spoke as well, and Heather Talbot, who donated the organs of her 22-year-old son after he was killed in an automobile accident.

Frank Bialystok, who received a liver transplant 13 years ago, spoke alongside Rabbi Grimberg, spiritual leader of Darchei Noam Congregation.

Bialystok, who had a bar mitzvah for his liver in shul, screened the film, My Second Bar Mitzvah, which is the story of his transplant.

The chair of the NCJW-TS Gift of Life program is Ronda Hecker. For more information on organ donation or to register, visit www.beadonor.ca.

FREE THE CHILDREN
Singers Luce Dufault, left, and Bruno Pelletier, second from left, were among the well-known Quebec artists performing in a benefit concert in support of Free the Children, held recently at the Segal Centre for Performing Arts. in Montreal. The event raised more than $6,000 to help establish an arts program for a primary school in India and providing famine relief in East Africa. With them are Gab Desmond, president of the concert's producer Unlimited MasterPeace, and Segal CEO Manon Gauthier.

CELEBRATING GILAD: Grade 8 students at the Toronto Heschel School lead their fellow students in song as they marked the release of Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit from Hamas captivity last week. One student said, "This is a miracle that I never thought I would witness."

PLANT STUDY: Grade 3 students at Robbins Hebrew Academy's Beth Tzedec campus – from left, Kaylan Shekarchi, Coco Einarsen and Abbey Stein – opened seeds to look at the embryo, food supply and seed coat as part of an effort to grow their own bean plants.

GIVING BACK: At Adam Korn's bar mitzvah on Sept. 17 at Beit Rayim Synagogue, the centrepieces were Simcha Baskets filled with pet food and toys. He donated them to the Newmarket branch of the OSPCA. "I wanted to do something meaningful to help these poor animals," said Adam, left, who is planning to become a veterinarian. He's pictured with OSPCA representative Jennifer Baker.

Tarbut festival features tribute to Bob Dylan

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Rady JCC, which for many years organized the annual Jewish book fair here, expanded the format of the event last year, creating the first annual Tarbut: Festival of Jewish Culture.

Authors were still featured, and books and crafts were still on display, but new programs were added, including concerts by Israeli musicians and a tribute to the late Mordecai Richler. This year, Tarbut, to be held Nov. 12 to 20, is offering even more.

Anita Diamant

"Tarbut was very well received last year," says Tamar Barr, the Rady JCC's programming director. "Over 3,000 people attended and we received a lot of positive feedback. So we decided to enhance our programming with more events."

This year's program kicks off with a tribute to Bob Dylan. (The former Bob Zimmerman is almost a local boy having grown up just a little south of here in Hibbing, Minn.) The concert is being orchestrated by Glenn Buhr, who will also be performing accompanied by local musicians who make up the Broken Songs Band.

Jazz is the musical thread running through Tarbut this year. Other concerts include the Aaron Weinstein Jazz Duo performing the works of great Jewish jazz composers such as George Gershwin, Irving Berlin and Artie Shaw, and the Afro-Semitic Experience, a band co-founded by African-American jazz pianist Warren Byrd and Jewish-American jazz bassist David Chevan, who play a mix of world beat, funk, jazz, cantorial, gospel, salsa, swing and soul.

Afro-Semitic Experience band

The featured authors this year include Anita Diamant whose novel, The Red Tent, became an international best seller. Her latest novel, Day After Night, is set in 1945 Palestine and tells the story of four young Jewish women, all Holocaust survivors, who make their way to Israel and an uncertain future. Diamant has also written six non-fiction guides to contemporary Jewish life.

Coming back for a return engagement is former Winnipegger Rhea Tregebov, who will highlight her first novel, The Knife Sharpener's Bell, which received the 2010 J.I. Segal Award for fiction on a Jewish theme, and was shortlisted for the ForeWord magazine's 2009 Book of the Year awards in the fiction category. The book explores the fate of a Jewish family who moves from Winnipeg to the U.S.S.R. in the mid-1930s, based in part on family history. The University of British Columbia assistant professor of creative writing previously edited Arguing with the Storm, an anthology of works by Yiddish woman writers, and several other anthologies.

Alison Pick's book Far to Go won the Canadian Jewish Book Award for fiction and was on the 2010 Top 10 book lists at NOW magazine and the Toronto Star. The historical novel traces one family's struggle to escape during the lead-up to the Nazi occupation of Czechoslovakia in 1939. Pick is from Toronto and has an earlier novel and two books of poetry to her credit.

Vancouver-based Roberta Rich's new novel, The Midwife of Venice, is set in 16th-century Venice. Her heroine is Hannah Levi, who fights for the survival of the man she loves and their babies.

Tarbut will also feature two Holocaust-themed documentaries. Ahead of Time is the story of Ruth Gruber, a young American reporter covering the last days of the war, who helped escort 1,000 Jewish refugees to New York and whose photos, published around the world, helped change world opinion of the Jewish refugees and their quest for a Jewish state.

The film marks the directorial debut of noted cinematographer Bob Richman, and is based on a series of interviews with the 100-year-old Gruber.

The Rescuers is the latest film from Emmy Award-winning filmmaker Michael King. It highlights the largely unknown stories of 13 diplomats who, at tremendous personal cost, saved tens of thousands of Jews during World War II. The film follows Stephanie Nyombayire, a young Rwandan anti-genocide activist who lost 100 members of her family in the Rwandan genocide of the 1990s, and Sir Martin Gilbert, the renowned 20th-century and Holocaust historian, as they travel across 15 countries and three continents interviewing survivors and descendants of the diplomats.

King will be attendance to answer questions after the screening, Barr reports.

Tarbut ends with a tribute to the late Winnipeg Jewish artist, Leonard Marcoe, who died earlier this year. Marcoe was not only an artist, but also a mentor to other artists and a patron of the arts through his long-running Leonard Marcoe Studio Gallery. The Tarbut Festival will present a special exhibit of Leonard Marcoe's work that will be on display throughout Tarbut week.

Subdued celebration greets Schalit's release

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Like Israelis and Jews the world over, the local community marked the liberation of Gilad Schalit last week with joy tempered by ambivalence, at a somewhat subdued community celebration Oct. 18 at Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation (BIBA).

As speakers made clear, the joy came from having Schalit finally freed and reunited with his family after 64 months of captivity by Hamas.

Israeli Vice-Consul Alon Melchior

The ambivalence came from the deal that freed him. The price for Schalit's liberation was Israel's release of more than 1,000 Palestinian prisoners – hundreds of them convicted for their direct roles in murdering Israeli citizens.

They included those convicted for the 1993 murder in Israel of Montreal native Joshua Friedberg and the 1999 murder of Hagit Zavitsky, a niece of Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, who relayed a message to the event from Ottawa.

"We had to negotiate that type of deal," Myer Bloom, a member of audience, told The CJN. "But it is something to celebrate. Hopefully, one day there will be peace between Israelis and Palestinians."

"It is a lousy deal that demonstrates Israel at its best," BIBA's Rabbi Reuben Poupko told the 400 assembled as TV cameras rolled. "It reflects the best values of the IDF. The State of Israel leaves no one behind."

Others at the hour-long event delivered a similar refrain. The fact that Israel agreed to make such a deal and pay such a high price, they said, personified the highest Jewish value of placing ultimate importance on human life.

"Yes, the price is heavy," echoed Israeli Vice-Consul Alon Melchior, speaking for Consul General Joel Lion, who was in Halifax. "Hamas is celebrating the messengers of death. We are celebrating life.

"We see the smile on Gilad's face and forget the price we paid."

"It is an evening of incomplete joy but complete pride," said Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem. "Our enemies are stronger today, [but] I've never been prouder of being a Jew."

"I don't call it a celebration. I will call it a happy occasion," Canadian Zionist Federation Eastern Region (CZF) president Arlazar Eliashiv, a friend of the Schalit family who met with them several times in Israel, told The CJN.

"It is a no-win situation [for Israel] but we have to celebrate. Like someone said today – I forget who – we celebrate with flowers and they celebrate with guns."

"Today, our prayers were answered," Joseph Alfie, a Montrealer who met with Schalit's father, Noam, 15 months ago in Israel, told the crowd.

Federation CJA president David Cape described the "relief and happiness" of the Jewish community. "We prayed every day for his freedom. We never lost hope," he said.

"We are all part of the Schalit family," Bergman said.

Those in attendance included Federation CJA CEO Deborah Corber; Saulie Zajdel, regional adviser to Tory cabinet minister Christian Paradis, and Rabbi Nadav Levin of Kollel Torah Mitzion (KTM).

The evening's sponsors were Israel's consulate general, Federation CJA, the Communauté Sépharade Unifiée du Québec, BIBA and KTM.

CFHU honours longtime volunteer

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Marvin Sadowski, 82, who is being honoured Nov. 6 by Canadian Friends of Haifa University (CFHU) for his lifetime achievements, says he looks for bargain suits so that he can give the money he saves to charity.

"Donating the money to a worthy cause does a lot more good than wearing an expensive suit," he said.

Sadowski, a father, grandfather and great-grandfather, still works every day as executive vice-president of Sterling Silver Development Corporation. He has sat on the CFHU board of directors for more than 20 years, and was vice-president from 1993 to 2001.

Marvin Sadowski

Among other volunteer positions, he is immediate past chair of Baycrest, a member of the board of directors of Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, a board member of Holy Blossom Temple, president of Metropolitan Toronto Housing Company and a board member of Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority.

In 2001, he received the Shem Tov Award from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

He fell in love with the University of Haifa, he said, about 30 years ago. "I was invited on a trip and I was immediately taken by the beautiful campus, which overlooks Haifa.

"I was also struck by the fact that about 25 per cent of the student body is Arab. I loved seeing Israelis and Arabs walking together. I think that maybe the rift could lessen, and even disappear, if everyone was educated together."

He decided to get involved with the university, he said, and was brought into CFHU by Michael Feldman.

Born in Massey, Ont., between Sudbury and Sault Ste. Marie, Sadowski said his was the only Jewish family there. "We were proud Jews though. We lit Shabbat candles every week and went to synagogue services in Sudbury."

He moved to Toronto in 1945 to finish school, and after marrying Ruth – who died about six years ago – he joined Holy Blossom Temple. He is now remarried.

"I was asked to help out at Baycrest when they needed help organizing residents who were moving into the Terraces of Baycrest. "I found out about Baycrest's work, and never left."

He stresses, however, that it is essential to get young people involved on all boards. "I have expertise, but I know that there are young people out there who can bring in more expertise.

"They are the next generation, and we have to step aside and let them do their work."

Proceeds from the Nov. 6 tribute dinner are earmarked for the Canada Science Pavilion at the University of Haifa, which will house cutting-edge research laboratories in fields including cancer, neuroscience, ecology and marine biology.

"Being a third-generation Canadian, I am proud that our country is playing such an important role at the university. I love Israel, and this makes it very special for me."

For information or to reserve tickets for the dinner, contact Hetty Shapiro, 416-972-9400, hshapiro@haifa-univ.ca or www.haifa-univ.ca.

Palestinian envoy recalled over Tweet

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Ottawa reprimanded the Palestinian envoy to Canada last week for disseminating an alleged antisemitic video via her Twitter account and told her she was no longer welcome in the country.

Earlier this month, Linda Sobeh Ali used the social messaging site to tell her followers to "check out" a link to a video posted on YouTube.

The video depicts a Palestinian girl reciting a poem in Arabic, "I am Palestinian." She becomes progressively more passionate and emotional as she speaks. English subtitles on the video at one point translate her as calling millions to wage a war that will "raze the injustice and oppression and destroy the Jews."

Once the Ministry of Foreign Affairs heard about Sobeh Ali's posting, she was called in to explain her actions and was informed her contact with the Canadian government would be curtailed.

The government then sent a formal protest to the Palestinian Authority, who last Wednesday recalled Sobeh Ali back to the West Bank.

In a statement last week, Sobeh Ali said she regretted the "unfortunate incident... it was a retweet unintentional and very unfortunate."

She added that the incident was "intentionally magnified and misinterpreted by certain lobbying groups."

The online translation that accompanied the video was disputed by Salah Basalamah, an associate professor in the University of Ottawa's School of Translation and Interpretation.

He told both the Globe and Mail and the CBC's As It Happens last week that the passage in question should be properly translated as calling people "to a war that is destroying oppression and kill the soul of Zionism."

Basalamah added: "There is in fact a big difference between calling for a war against Zionism and a war against Jews."

The difference between Judaism and Zionism is the difference between a religion and a political ideology, he told the CBC.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), refuted Basalamah, telling The CJN the video in question was unabashed in its "hatred and hostility" toward Jews and Israel.

For Sobeh Ali to have been the one circulating it and validating it is "antithetical" to her purpose in Canada, Fogel said. That purpose is the pursuit of "constructive opportunities to advance the peace process and reconciliation."

"There are many translations that suggest that the [video calls on people] to war against those that adhere to the ideology" of Zionism and did in fact call for the killing of Jews.

Fogel said he had worked with Sobeh Ali in Ottawa with the desire to "engage in constructive dialogue" between the Jewish and Palestinian Canadian communities, but that he had become increasingly concerned that Sobeh Ali had, over the last while, become more strident in her anti-Israel views.

He said this latest incident reflected the duplicitous nature of the PA.

"While they talk about a desire to reach peace, they are central in the campaign to incite hatred and violence against Jews and the Jewish state. Her participation in this is just more proof."

Bialik Hebrew Day School
בית ספר יומי ע"ש ביאליק טאג שול

Bialik Hebrew Day School, Toronto
Campus Principal

Founded in 1961, Bialik Hebrew Day School in Toronto is renowned as an outstanding Jewish educational institution, serving students from Junior Kindergarten to grade 8. - Be a collaborative leader and team player
- Possess strong interpersonal skills
- Possess strong oral and written communication skills
- Have a strong work ethic
- Be a natural leader who will inspire staff, students and parents
- Have experience and skills in curriculum development
- Have knowledge and experience in professional development for staff
- Have a proven record of skill and experience in hiring and supervision of staff
- Have skills and experience in the effective use of metrics to measure and analyze educational outcomes
- Be a forward thinking, flexible, innovative, creative educator
- Have the ability to understand, embrace and implement administrative and instructional applications of technology
- Have prior teaching and educational administrative experience (JK-12)
- Have a knowledge of Hebrew and Jewish studies curriculum
- Have a minimum Masters in Education/Educational Administration and Principal Certification

The search committee will accept applications until December 23, 2011. Please respond electronically, in confidence, with a letter of introduction and resume that includes the names of three references (who will not be contacted without the consent of the applicant) to campusprincipal@bialik.ca.

While we appreciate all applicants' interest, we will contact only those selected for an interview.

New consul general pays first visit to N.S.

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Joel Lion wanted to be sure Nova Scotia Premier Darrell Dexter was prepared.

The newly appointed consul general of Israel to Quebec and the Atlantic provinces met with Nova Scotia's top politician Oct. 18, a day before the latter left for a one-week trade mission to Israel.

"I thought it would be a good thing for me to sit with him and talk of his aims for the mission," Lion said at a brief social gathering with Halifax Jewish community leaders before flying back to Montreal at the end of a one-day visit.

"He's meeting with [Israeli President] Shimon Peres, and ministers in infrastructure, science and technology and business, as well as making a trip to Ramallah to meet with Palestinian business interests," Lion said.

"My office helped plan the mission, so talking with him face to face was important. I told Mr. Dexter this is only the beginning [of trade relations between Nova Scotia and Israel]. We want to show Israel in the light of business, education, technology and even culture, food and wine."

He added that Dexter's side trip to Ramallah is "a good sign. Anyone we can have there to help their economy takes the emphasis away from terror. It's a stage to having two countries, which we know will happen some day."

The mission includes various Nova Scotia business interests, including representatives of Dalhousie University, its medical school's brain injury department, members of the Halifax Port Commission, a real estate developer, and two leaders of Nova Scotia Business Inc.

Lion, who assumed his new post in early September and is fluent in six languages, did an English radio talk show interview and an interview on CBC French television during the whirlwind trip. He also met with Atlantic Jewish Council president Shulamith Medjuck and AJC executive director Jon Goldberg.

In a lighter moment, he made a deal with Medjuck to come back to see Camp Kadimah next summer, when the weather is better and camp is in session, as she boasted about one of the AJC's jewels.

Earlier in the day, he watched with interest the swap of kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit for more than 1,000 Palestinian prisoners held in Israel.

"While I can't comment directly on what I think of the swap, because I'm just a civil servant, I see it as so interesting that we're celebrating life [with the return of Schalit] and [the Palestinians are] celebrating death [with their celebration of the return of convicted terrorists]," said Lion.

"It was courageous for our prime minister to make the decision [to make the prisoner swap]. Now 80 per cent of Israelis are behind him. Perhaps this shows we're ready to make other deals, that we want our neighbours to recognize Israel as the state of the Jewish nation. When we're recognized as having a right to be there, perhaps that will be the end of the claims and the end of conflicts."

Joel Lion, centre, Israel's consul ceneral to Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, uses his iPhone to show coverage of the historic return of Gilad Schalit to Atlantic Jewish Council leadership Michael Argand and Kathy Zilbert during Lion's brief trip to Halifax Oct. 18. [Joel Jacobson photo]

TORAH MARCH: Temple Kol Ami celebrated as the congregation recently returned home to its beautifully renovated sanctuary in Leo Baeck Day School at 36 Atkinson Ave. in Thornhill. The congregation marched its Torah scrolls back home in a spirited and public gathering that started blocks away and ended at the new Temple Kol Ami. Here, Anita Small, chair of the Kol Ami sacred space committee, brings the Torah in to the building along with Barry Bernstein and benefactor Leslie Dan. Rabbi Micah Streiffer and Cantorial Soloist Dawn Bernstein led the congregation in song as the Torah scrolls were carried into their new home.

TORAH PROJECT: As part of Temple Har Zion's 40th anniversary celebrations, the synagogue community will participate, with the help of Torah scribe Neil Yerman, in the writing of a new Torah. Sept. 16 marked the launch of the L'Dor Vador (from generation to generation) Torah Project. Above, Rabbi Michael Stroh, standing, rabbi emeritus of Temple Har Zion, with the assistance of Yerman, seated, writes a letter in the new Torah.

Lipstadt to open Holocaust Education Week

Says Lipstadt: "Her conception [was] that he was just a pencil pusher, though a pencil pusher who deserved to die… she said some very horrible things but at the same time, some very powerful things."

Much scorn has been heaped on Arendt for her iconic description of Nazi evil as "banal." In fact, Lipstadt argues in Arendt's defence, "she thought nothing of the kind. She used the term 'banal' to bolster her contention that Eichmann did not act out of deep ideological commitment or because he was inherently evil."

What Arendt tried to understand with that word was how Eichmann, like so many other Germans, "so seamlessly became killers."

Some readers may be jarred to learn from Lipstadt that Arendt was absent for much of the Eichmann trial, including for Hausner's cross-examination. "That's so striking, it's mind-boggling," Lipstadt says. It also "constituted a breach of faith with her readers."

Ultimately, Lipstadt paints a picture of a complex, multi-faceted Arendt, one who could be "flippant, cruel, glib and got many of her facts wrong," but who "also worried deeply about the security of Israel" and "raised painful and important questions in relation to leadership and individual responsibility."

Arendt sought to "needle her readers to examine their assumptions," Lipstadt writes, and though shocked and hurt by the wrath she provoked, "was the author, writ large, of her own misfortune."

Lipstadt says she was struck by "how many people mercilessly condemned [Arendt] and how many people were simply enthralled with what she said." She re-read Arendt's book. "There were parts of it I found absolutely appalling and parts of it I found tremendously powerful, affirming and important, and [there were] things I felt had been ignored

"For those who think she walks on water, they think I'm too tough on her. For those who think she was horrendous, they think I'm too easy on her. So I guess I hit it right."

'Gates of hope have opened'

Sephardic Kehila Centre president Max Benaim triumphantly removed a rubber bracelet from his wrist that served as reminder of Schalit's incarceration. "Our son and brother came home," Benaim said. "While we all prayed for this to come, expecting this day was pushing it."

Now, "it feels likes the gates of hope have opened."

While questions were raised about the high price paid, Schalit's release serves as a reminder "of the extra value the Jewish people place on the sanctity of Jewish life," remarked David Spiro, Toronto chair of CIJA.

Israel "demonstrated that it values life over death and will never leave its sons and daughters behind," Spiro said.

A l'chaim to Schalit was offered by Rabbi Daniel Korobkin, spiritual leader of the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto synagogue in Thornhill. Politicians present included Conservative MP Mark Adler, Toronto Ward 10 Coun. James Pasternak and Markham Ward 2 Coun. Howard Shore.

Understanding Genesis and science

Lauren Kramer

Vancouver engineer Daniel Friedmann, 55, published The Genesis One Code in September, a book in which he demonstrates a clear alignment between the times of key events described in the Creation narrative in the book of Genesis with those derived from scientific theory and observation. In a recent interview, Friedmann talked about his goal in writing the book and what he learned in the process.

CJN: You're an engineer. What was the impetus to tackle The Genesis One Code*?*

Friedmann: To become an engineer I studied engineering physics, which had a large physics and cosmology component. I realized then that some answers were missing in science, and continued to search for them both in science and in Kabbalah, which I began studying 13 years ago. Once my nephews entered high school and university, I found they had similar questions, and in discussions with them, I became motivated to work harder on the issues. At the same time, I read some work on the Age of the Universe by the late Rabbi Aryeh Kaplan that got me started on what's in my book.

Daniel Friedmann

CJN: What did you learn in researching and writing it that you didn't know before?

Friedmann: On the science front, as I updated myself, I found that despite tremendous advances in science, some key fundamentals remained unanswered as they were when I went to school 30 years ago. This reinvigorated me to search further for answers in religion. On the Kabbalah side, I found that the amount of available material is amazing, rivalling science in depth, which is something I had not appreciated before. I also found that there were answers to all kinds of "science topics" that I had not expected.

Most of all, I found a pretty exact correspondence between the Genesis account of the development of the universe and the appearance of life on Earth (as interpreted with the help of other Jewish sources hundreds of years old) and the scientific account of the same events (as developed in the past 50 years or so). It's enough to give you goose bumps.

Finally I found a Torah reason why science is so accurate in many areas but has struggled with a few key questions for so long. The areas or events that science struggles with correspond precisely to out-of-nothing creations in the Genesis narrative, which cannot by definition be explained by science.

CJN: What is the central nugget of your book that you wish more people knew?

Friedmann: Genesis clearly states that God made most of the universe and life using the powers of nature, and as such, we should not be surprised that we are able to understand most things through the scientific method. Further, the answers that science has recently found have been in our Scriptures for hundreds of years. Finally that we are told in Genesis exactly where events outside of nature occurred and therefore where the scientific method will fail – and that is where it has failed so far! For example, science has failed to explain the beginning of the Big Bang, or the nature and source for the human soul.

CJN: At what demographic is this book targeted? Who do you think would find it interesting and for which audience did you write it?

Friedmann: My motivation was the 15- to 30-year-olds that come out of our secular system believing science has all the answers and the Bible has become somewhat irrelevant at explaining our origins. I wanted them to know that the Bible actually has answers to questions that remain unanswered by science. Since I started writing the book, I have seen interest from all ages.

CJN: Did you have a particular mentor or mentors? If so, who were they and how did they assist or guide you?

Friedmann: My key teachers have been the rabbis of the Vancouver Ohel Ya'Akov Community Kollel, Rabbi Avraham Feigelstock and Rabbi Shmuel Yeshayahu. I attended their classes every week for many years. In addition, they're always open to my questions, and in particular, to helping me find sources and references to help formulate the answers found in the book.

CJN: What's your next project?

Friedmann: The Genesis One Code is drawn from Chapter 1 of Genesis and is therefore focused on the development of the universe and the appearance of life on earth. Humankind only gets about three pages in the book. My next project is drawn from Chapters 2 to 11 of Genesis and will be focused on a book on humankind. I plan to demonstrate agreement between Genesis and science on the history of Homo sapiens from their appearance 200,000 years ago until a few thousand years ago.

Internet daily deal company grows quickly

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

As businesses go, Dealfind is not exactly recession-proof, but it's as close to recession-proof as you're likely going to get.

As its name suggests, the online service offers its customers bargains on goods and services, usually between 50 and 90 per cent off the list price. So, when times are good, people buy; when times are tough, like now, people still buy. After all, it's hard to turn your back on a 90 per cent price reduction on something like carpet shampooing or house cleaning.

Available online at Dealfind.com, the company operates with the idea that it's never the wrong time to save money.

Apparently, there is some currency to that premise, as in the 16 months it has been up and running, Dealfind has grown between 10 and 20 per cent – per month! Revenues are well into the seven figures and the privately held firm has multiplied its staff by a factor of more than 10, adding experienced administrative and sales people.

Gary Lipovetsky and Mike Tulman, who both had extensive experience in the commercial Internet space, founded the firm with the idea that they had to distinguish it from other Internet discount sites, like Groupon. They did so by coming up with their "ambassador" program in which customers who purchase vouchers for goods or services can themselves receive even greater rebates if they sign up their friends to make the same purchase. People do so through Facebook, Twitter, e-mails or, shock of shocks, word of mouth. "We pay our customers to tell their friends," Lipovetsky told The CJN.

Dealfind pays out more than $100,000 a month on the program.

Lipovetsky believes Dealfind has found a unique niche in bridging the space between merchants and consumers. Consumers love the discounts on everyday items, they are flocking to recruit their friends, and merchants are willing to discount their products to get new customers in the door. "Loss leaders" are as old as retail, said Lipovetsky, and they still have the power to entice customers. Once they're in the shop, restaurant or store, they typically increase their purchases or, in a best-case scenario, become repeat customers.

"This is a great marketing tool for merchants," said Lipovetsky. "It's a lot less risky [and costly] than traditional media like TV and radio."

With a product line that has included spa treatments, laser hair removal, get-away packages and house cleaning, it's clear that women make up the bulk of Dealfind's demographic. Lipovetsky said research shows 70 per cent of Dealfind's customers are women, though often they make purchases for their male partners, obtaining for them subscriptions to men's magazines or furnace cleanings.

Gary Lipovetsky

"I think women are more responsible than men. They want a good deal. They're more responsible and more frugal," he said.

Last week, Lipovetsky told the Dealfind story to a meeting of the Canada Israel Chamber of Commerce. He has become more emotionally tied to the Jewish state over the past few years, following several trips there, and his fiancé is Israeli.

A couple of years ago he attended the Affilicon trade show in Israel, which bills itself as exploring the latest trends in "affiliate marketing" in social networking and Internet technologies.

Afterwards, he and a friend spent a week touring the country.

Lipovetsky, who grew up in the Bathurst and Steeles area and counted many Israelis and Russian-Israelis as his friends, said he felt right at home in Israel.

He did not discount the possibility of one day doing business there.

In the near term, however, he has his gaze set firmly on North American expansion. So far, Dealfind has a presence in more than 40 Canadian and U.S. cities.

Its main merchant partners remain small to medium-sized businesses. It's a real "people business" and it's easier to interact with someone running their own shop than dealing with layers of corporate bureaucracy common at blue chip companies, Lipovetsky said.

Still, Dealfind has added many sales people – its overall staff has jumped from 25 at inception to 275 today – and they're trying to make inroads with larger firms.

Dealfind has also added experienced staff to its "C suite" – top level executives such as the CFO – who came to Dealfind from such notable companies as Lavalife, IBM, MTS Allstream and Bell.

Dealfind is able to recruit top tier talent because of a recent infusion of $31 million. The success of the company has attracted the attention of a number of venture capital funds, including Insight Venture Partners, a New York-based company that was the first to invest in Twitter; the Ontario Venture Capital Fund, a government/private partnership, and Georgian Partners, a Toronto venture capital firm.

In addition to upgrading the company's management, the funds are going to increase Dealfind's media presence.

Jeff Lieberman, managing director at Insight, said on making the investment: "We were impressed by Dealfind's solid business model, calibre of their clientele, and the speed with which they have become the number one daily deal company in Canada. Our decision to partner with these Canadian entrepreneurs was an easy one to make."

Despite the infusion of cash, Lipovetsky and Tulman, who co-founded another online company, MenuPalace.com, in 1999, retained control of Dealfind's shares and its board. Still, the presence of venture capital angels has proven a boon to Dealfind, and not just due to the cash, Lipovetsky said.

"Our interests are aligned," he said. Insight is so well respected and influential that with one call, they can arrange introductions in places where Dealfind is unknown; they provide valuable advice; and, generally, open doors that would be closed to them.

"It's impossible for an entrepreneur to know everything about everything," Lipovetsky said. "My advice to budding partnerships is take the smart money; that makes all the difference."

Assassination plot underscores Iranian threat

Ron Kampeas
JTA

WASHINGTON — Iran watchers say the revelation of an alleged plot to hire Mexican contract killers to assassinate the Saudi Arabian ambassador to Washington signals the Iranian regime's deepening radicalization.

It also underscores the urgency of the threat posed by Tehran's nuclear plans, they say.

"We need to be reminded that if Iran poses a threat without nuclear weapons, a nuclear-armed Iran would be a dramatically more dangerous threat," Rep. Ted Deutch (D-Fla.), a longtime advocate of Iran sanctions legislation, told JTA.

U.S. Attorney General Eric Holder alleged last week that Iranian-American businessman Mansour Arbabsiar and a cousin who works for the Iranian Revolutionary Guards were caught planning to have a Mexican drug cartel kill Saudi Arabia's ambassador, Adel al-Jubeir. Demonstrating the seriousness of the plot, the men allegedly arranged for a $100,000 down payment to be deposited into what turned out to be an FBI bank account.

Iranian-backed attacks outside the Middle East once were routine news events. The years that followed the Islamic Revolution of the late 1970s brought a flurry of assassinations of Iranian exiles in foreign capitals, including Washington and Paris. In the 1990s, separate massive bombing attacks on a Jewish community building and the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires also have been pinned to Iran.

Iranian-sponsored attacks abroad receded in the later 1990s as the Islamic Republic under then-president Mohammad Khatami sought international legitimacy. At the same time, however, Tehran aggressively stepped up its nuclear program, which is widely believed to be aimed at acquiring nuclear weapons.

The alleged plan to kill the Saudi envoy is a signal that the regime's conservatives are ascendant, said Roya Hakakian, who recently wrote Assassins of the Turquoise Palace, an account of Iran's assassination of Kurdish leaders in Berlin in 1992.

Conservatives consolidated power after the mass protests following elections in the summer of 2009 that were widely perceived as being rigged, she noted.

"The 2009 elections in Iran increasingly solidified the hold of the conservatives on power in Iran," she said. "They see it less and less necessary to try and do what Khatami was doing in the 1990s, to bring Iran into the fold of western civilization and community. It's a sign of further polarization inside Iran between the nation and the regime, but also outside of Iran between Iran and the international community."

The plot also is a sign of a regime driven increasingly desperate by its mounting isolation, said Heather Hurlburt of the National Security Network, a liberal Washington foreign policy group.

Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

The Obama administration has drawn traditional Iranian partners Russia and China into the sanctions regime, she said, and Iran's nuclear program apparently has been sabotaged at least once. Moreover, the Iranian regime is attempting to respond to a burgeoning regional pro-democracy wave that it fears could spread to Iran.

"What you're seeing in these plot allegations and in the region is an Iran that perceives its interests to be at risk because of the Arab Spring," Hurlburt said. "You see an Iranian government exploring all avenues – they couldn't come up with a better plot than a crazy guy trying to hire drug lords."

The plot underscores the need for a heightened awareness by the West of a regime that is ready to take extraordinary measures, said Mark Dubowitz, executive director of the conservative Foundation for the Defense of Democracies.

"This regime will continue to target its enemies," Dubowitz said. "They will not let up until there's a success."

Outreach to a drug cartel is typical of a regime that has cultivated rogue actors throughout the Middle East, in Europe and in Latin America, Hakakian said.

The Iranian Revolutionary Guards "has been smart," she said. "They have been solidifying relations with Venezuelans, with the Cubans, and now they have been moved into Mexican territory."

Working through interlocutors as unlikely as murderous drug dealers makes sense, Dubowitz said, because the regime has always sought plausible deniability in plotting such attacks.

The immediate response to the plot, said Dubowitz, should be to further isolate the Iranian regime by enforcing existing sanctions and enacting new ones, as well as reinforcing backing for Iran's democracy movement. He suggested, among other measures, a strike fund to assist Iranian oil workers and others. Deutch, a member of the U.S. House of Representatives foreign affairs committee, said that the Obama administration should enhance financial sanctions to include Iran's central bank, which would cut off the country from financial markets, and toughen laws on businesses that deal with Iran.

Turkey rejects quake aid offers

JTA

JERUSALEM — Turkey has rejected all international aid, including an Israeli offer, in the wake of a strong earthquake that collapsed buildings and left hundreds dead.

Sunday's quake, which measured 7.3 on the Richter scale and was centred in southeastern Turkey, was felt in central Tel Aviv, Ha'aretz reported. As of press time on Monday morning, at least 239 people were confirmed dead, with many others reportedly trapped in collapsed buildings.

"The State of Israel shares in your sorrow following the earthquake that has claimed victims from among your people," Israeli President Shimon Peres said Sunday in a call to Turkish President Abdullah Gul.

"I speak as a man, as a Jew and as an Israeli who remembers, and is well aware of, the depth of the historic relations between our two peoples and thus I send the condolences of the entire nation to the families of those who lost their lives. At this difficult time, the State of Israel is ready to render any assistance that may be required anywhere in Turkey, at any time."

Gul thanked Peres for the telephone call, the expression of condolences and the offer of assistance, according to the president's office, and said that he hoped Turkish search and rescue could handle the emergency alone. Diplomatic relations between Israel and Turkey are now nearly nonexistent.

Israel's Defence Ministry and Foreign Minister had been in contact with Turkish officials Sunday in order to offer assistance. An Israel Defence Forces search and rescue delegation is prepared to leave for Turkey if it is called upon, according to reports.

Diplomatic relations between Israel and Turkey have deteriorated since nine Turkish nationals, including a Turkish-American dual citizen, were killed in May 2010 during an Israeli raid on a Turkish-flagged aid flotilla attempting to break Israel's naval blockade on the Hamas-controlled Gaza Strip. Turkey has demanded an Israeli apology for the deaths and compensation to the victims' families.

Israel has offered its "regret" for the deaths, and has said that its naval commandos fired in self-defence. Relations had been going downhill since the 2008-09 Gaza war.

Turkey sent several firefighting airplanes to Israel last December to help battle the massive Carmel Forest fire.

Israel urged to boost Abbas and the PA

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel should make a series of gestures to the Palestinian Authority to reduce the damage caused the PA by last week's deal for the return of Gilad Schalit, the Israel Defence Forces' General Staff believes. But Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's advisers oppose the idea, as do several members of his forum of eight senior ministers, arguing that PA President Mahmoud Abbas "should be punished" for his unilateral bid for UN recognition of a Palestinian state.

"We don't want the Palestinian Authority to collapse," one adviser said, "but if it happens, it won't be the end of the world."

Next month, the IDF will give the government a list of the gestures it recommends, including releasing additional Palestinian prisoners and perhaps transferring additional parts of the West Bank to Palestinian security control. The army considers this necessary to help Abbas regain the upper hand in his ongoing battle with Hamas for control of the territories, since Israel's intelligence agencies all concur that the Schalit deal, in which Hamas obtained the release of 1,027 Palestinian prisoners in exchange for one kidnapped soldier, bolstered the Islamist organization at the PA's expense.

One senior Israeli official told Ha'aretz that Abbas thinks the deal was deliberately intended to strengthen Hamas and weaken him, in order to punish him for his UN bid.

One of the IDF's proposals relates to the second stage of the Schalit deal, in which Israel will free another 550 prisoners of its own choosing. While the list has not yet been drawn up, it seems that most will be low-level terrorists belonging to Abbas' Fatah party, and the army deems the Fatah affiliation critical.

The army also proposes that Israel release additional prisoners beyond these 550 as a gesture to Abbas in honour of Id al-Adha, the Muslim holiday that falls in another two weeks.

Another proposal is to transfer part of what is known as Area B – areas of the West Bank that, according to the Oslo accords, are under Palestinian civilian control but Israeli security control – to Area A, which is under full Palestinian control. Most of the territory the army favours transferring is in the northern West Bank, as this area has few Israeli settlements.

Another suggestion is returning the bodies of slain terrorists to the PA. That was supposed to have happened a few months ago, but was cancelled at the last minute on orders from Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak.

Senior PA officials have said in recent days that the principal gesture they want from Israel is the release of Fatah terrorists who have been imprisoned since before the 1993 Oslo accords. They also said they have had several discussions with Israel recently about transferring additional territory to Area A, but all have gone nowhere.

In the past, Barak has voiced support for far-reaching gestures toward Abbas. But Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman has consistently opposed the idea and Netanyahu is unenthusiastic. Thus, when the army proposed gestures to the PA in the run-up to last month's UN bid, with the goal of calming the atmosphere and preventing an explosion, the government rejected the proposal.

With the Schalit deal concluded, the IDF is hoping the government will be more amenable. But that seems doubtful.

The issue is further complicated by uncertainty over Abbas' intentions – a question on which both government officials and intelligence professionals are split. Some believe that Abbas has no interest in resuming negotiations with Israel, preferring to pursue his case at the UN and among the international community in the hope of forcing concessions on Israel. Members of this camp see no point in making any gestures to him.

The IDF, in contrast, thinks Israel must make substantial gestures to bolster Abbas. Minor steps – like dismantling unmanned roadblocks or releasing Palestinian prisoners convicted of crimes other than terrorism – won't suffice, it argues.

Over the last two weeks, the Israeli official said, several of Abbas' advisers, including his chief negotiator, Saeb Erekat, have urged him to disband the PA and hand responsibility for the territories back to Israel. This has strengthened the army's view that gestures to bolster Abbas are needed.

Netanyahu's advisers, however, don't take Abbas' resignation threats seriously, noting that such threats tend to recur frequently. "There's nothing new in this," said one. "He threatens all the time."

Colombia tries to mediate an end to the conflict opposed the Palestinians' unilateral bid at the United Nations for statehood, Abbas did not oppose Colombian mediation. That laid the groundwork for Santos to send his foreign minister on a secret visit to the region.

She met Abbas in Ramallah Oct. 16 and presented several formulas for a meeting between Abbas and Netanyahu, one of which would involve a secret meeting between the two in the region. Another option was for the two leaders to meet in Colombia.

Abbas told Holguin he does not oppose a resumption of negotiations with Israel, but Netanyahu would have to commit to certain steps regarding settlement construction, even if only a symbolic gesture that would let Abbas present it to the Palestinian public as an accomplishment.

Holguin met with Netanyahu Oct. 17 at the Prime Minister's Office. According to a senior Israeli official, Holguin told the prime minister that Abbas was in a particularly gloomy mood and sounded despondent during their talk.

Holguin said Abbas desperately needed a symbolic gesture from Israel on the settlement issue. Netanyahu surprised her by responding that he would be ready to make such a gesture if it would return Abbas to the negotiating table. He agreed to freeze construction by the government and to halt building on government land. But he said he would not agree to freeze construction by private developers on privately owned land in the settlements. Only a small portion of construction in the settlements is carried out or funded by the government, however. Most is done by private parties.

Netanyahu said the Palestinians are using the settlement issue as an excuse to stay away from the negotiating table, adding that his government has done less building in the settlements than any previous government. Netanyahu said he is ready to test Abbas by making the gesture regarding settlements. If Abbas is serious about negotiations, he will renew direct talks, Netanyahu said.

Senior Israeli officials said they don't believe Abbas is interested in renewed talks with Israel but would rather continue to pursue the Palestinian membership bid at the United Nations. This month's prisoner exchange for Gilad Schalit only reinforces that intention, the officials said.

Israel sends olive tree to Pope

JTA

JERUSALEM — An olive tree more than 200 years old grown near Nazareth has been sent as a gift to Pope Benedict XVI from Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

The tree was to be planted Oct. 26 during a ceremony at Viale Degli Ulivi, or Olive Tree Boulevard, in the Vatican Gardens.

Netanyahu said the tree symbolizes the blooming friendship between Israel and the Vatican, and it represents the aspiration to foster peace and brotherhood between peoples and religions. The gift follows the prime minister's recent visit to the Vatican museum.

The Jewish National Fund selected and shipped the tree to the port of Ravenna in Italy. JNF world chair Effi Stenzler will attend the ceremony.

'I am recovering slowly and happy to be home'

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israeli President Shimon Peres visited Gilad Schalit and his family at their home in Mitzpe Hila on Monday, less than a week after the Israel Defence Forces soldier was released by Hamas. Peres was the first Israeli official to visit Schalit at his home.

"I am slowly regaining my strength and am happy to be home," Schalit told Peres during the visit. He thanked the president for his support and for the help he had given his parents during their campaign for his release.

Schalit visited the beach with his father, Noam, on Sunday.

The president praised Schalit for the bravery he demonstrated during his five years of captivity after he was kidnapped by Hamas. "I came on behalf of the whole nation to tell you how happy we are to have you home," Peres told Schalit.

Not many people could have withstood such suffering and emerged standing so tall, Peres reportedly said, telling Schalit he has "enormous strength and endurance."

Peres lent his support to the family from the time Schalit was abducted in 2006. The president also hosted the captive soldier's parents, Noam and Aviva, at his residence, shortly after the prisoner exchange that paved the way for their son's release was announced.

On Sunday, the family received a visit from Sheikh Salah Shibli of the Arab Israeli village of Shibli.

Meanwhile, activists from the campaign to free Gilad Schalit on Monday began dismantling the protest tent erected in front of the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem more than a year ago.

Israeli police have decided that the barrier on the path leading to Schalit's home could be removed in an effort to return things to normal in the community, but several curiosity-seekers used the opportunity to walk right up to the Schalits' front door.

Local authorities decided to hire a private security service, which was to guard the Schalit home as of this past Monday. The chair of the Mitzpe Hila local committee, Mor Tarzi, said authorities were also considering installing an electric gate at the entrance to the community.

Visitors continue to make their way to Mitzpe Hila, drawn by Gilad Schalit's return home. Hundreds of letters and packages for the IDF soldier from around the world have also arrived since his release.

In related news, on Sunday Israeli opposition leader Tzipi Livni criticized the prisoner swap that freed Schalit, saying it weakened Israel and strengthened Hamas.

In an interview Sunday on Israel Radio, Livni said the next phase of the deal, in which 550 Palestinian additional prisoners are to be released, should be co-ordinated with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, whose authority extends over the West Bank.

Livni, who heads the Kadima party, also called for the peace process to be restarted, saying the prisoner swap creates a unique opportunity to launch new talks.

Some 477 Palestinian prisoners from Gaza and the West Bank were released last week in exchange for Schalit in a deal reached between Israel and the terrorist organization Hamas.

"Israel is currently losing its power of deterrence, with Hamas firing from Gaza and [Israel] unable to act against it as it did in the past," Livni said.

Livni also accused the government of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of failing to consider the effect the deal would have on Israel's relations with the Palestinian Authority. "From the viewpoint of those members of the government who do not want a settlement, the strengthening of Hamas may not be such a bad thing, but I believe in a settlement," Livni said.

Livni added that, like the rest of the country, she too had been moved by the sight of Schalit returning.

"It is regrettable that Livni relates to Gilad Schalit like a reality outcast," said a statement from the Likud in response to Livni's remarks. "No less regrettable is the fact that she chose to be abroad on holiday when all the people of Israel were excited by his return.

"Livni... failed to speak up when she should have," the Likud statement read. "She seems to have forgotten that Gilad Schalit was captured when she was a high-ranking government minister. Apparently, she has also forgotten that she failed to bring him home."

Livni was Israel's foreign affairs minister when Schalit was captured in a cross-border raid in June 2006. A Kadima-led government reportedly negotiated a similar deal that did not come to fruition.

Ariel Sharon responsive, son says

Former Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is responsive and has gained weight, his son told the New York Times. Sharon, who has been in a coma since suffering a stroke nearly six years ago, moves his fingers when requested and looks at people when he is awake, Gilad Sharon told the newspaper on Oct. 20, in advance of the release of his biography of his father, Sharon: The Life of a Leader, set to be released in Hebrew and English on Oct. 26. Ariel Sharon, 83, remains in a hospital near Tel Aviv following a brief stay at his ranch in southern Israel. Gilad Sharon wrote in his book that he gave his father the idea of unilaterally withdrawing from Gaza, according to the Times. His accounts of his father's dealings with current Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu are unflattering to Netanyahu. Gilad Sharon, a member of his father's Kadima party, is said to be interested in entering politics.

Egypt gas line fixed

Egypt has renewed pumping gas to Israel through a pipeline that has been attacked six times in less than a year. It is the first time that gas has flowed to Israel through the pipeline since July. The return of Egyptian gas began last Sunday. Gas flow was also renewed to Jordan, which recently agreed to pay a higher price for its gas, Reuters reported. Egypt is expected to demand that Israel agree to a price hike as well. Egypt supplies Israel with more than 40 per cent of its natural gas needs to produce electricity. Electricity prices have risen by more than 10 per cent in Israel since the attacks began. The most recent attack came in late September, when three men fired on the pipeline at a pumping station in the northern Sinai. Selling gas to Israel has been unpopular on the Egyptian street since the opening of the pipeline in 2008. Former President Hosni Mubarak has been accused of giving Israel a sweetheart deal on the gas.

Suspicious forest fires

More than 40 fires broke out across northern Israel over the weekend, many of which are suspected arson attacks. While some of the forest fires are being considered the result of negligence, many are being investigated as arson attacks due to their multiple sources of ignition, according to Ha'aretz. Dozens of people in the western Galilee were evacuated from their homes and hundreds of acres of forests were destroyed, according to reports. Hot dry winds and warm temperatures caused the fires to spread quickly. Fire trucks and firefighter aircrafts were called in to control the blazes. An out-of-control fire in the Carmel Forest last December led to 44 deaths. In addition, 250 homes were destroyed or severely damaged, 17,000 people were forced to evacuate, more than 12,000 acres were burned and an estimated five million trees were lost.

Urging children to become martyrs

A failed Palestinian suicide bomber freed in the swap for Gilad Schalit told Gaza schoolchildren that she hoped they would follow in her footsteps. "I hope you will walk the same path we took and, God willing, we will see some of you as martyrs," Wafa al-Biss told children who had gathered at her home last Thursday, a day after she was released along with 477 Palestinian prisoners in the first part of a deal to secure the release of the captured Israeli soldier, Reuters reported. Biss was serving a 12-year term for planning to blow herself up. She was arrested in 2005 when Israeli soldiers noticed she was walking strangely and found 22 pounds of explosives sewn into her underwear. A member of the Al Awsa Martyrs Brigades, an offshoot of the Fatah party, Biss was traveling to a Be'er Sheva Hospital at the time for medical treatments. Biss told Reuters that she had planned to blow herself up at the checkpoint, but her detonator had malfunctioned. The children reportedly chanted in response, "We will give souls and blood to redeem the prisoners. We will give souls and blood for you, Palestine."

Art Spiegelman's uncanny art

Maus, one of the best-known books addressing the Holocaust, has received a new and intriguing treatment from its author. MetaMaus, (Pantheon) a weighty and lavishly produced volume, is built around substantial interviews Art Spiegelman gave to Chicago-based academic Hillary Chute between 2006 and 2010.

These are presented alongside a dazzling collection of illustrations, which include non-Maus comic art by Spiegelman and the comic strip artists he admires; personal photos; artwork from Maus in its published state; as well as a wealth of preparatory artwork, sketches and draft panels, which range from first thoughts to near-finished quality. Spiegelman discusses these drafts in fascinating detail in the interviews, as he lays out his artistic goals.

Among the hallmarks of Spiegelman's original two-volume Maus are its directness, its entanglement with the history of comic book art, and its conscientious attention to historical detail. These qualities come to the fore in MetaMaus.

Followers of Spiegelman will be familiar with some of the material in his new volume. He has written in intriguing ways in other forums about his sense of "early comic books" as "largely a Jewish creation." The gradual process by which he arrived at the idea of presenting mice and cats, in place of Jews and Germans, has been told elsewhere.

Reviewed by

Norman Ravvin

MetaMaus complements this material with finely reproduced examples of early American comic art, with images from the tradition of racist caricature that embodied blacks and Asians as grotesque animals, as well as with examples of Nazi propaganda that equated Jews with vermin. In MetaMaus, these ideas and their associated traditions of illustrative art are gathered, for the first time, cohesively.

The remarkable aspect of MetaMaus might be that a book about Maus – which is, arguably, as good as it needs to be on its own – can prove revealing in new ways.

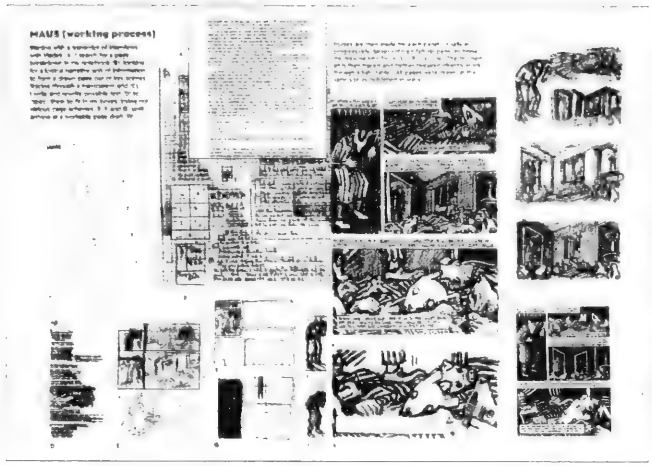
There are a few things in MetaMaus that some readers might find superfluous. Among these are short interviews with Spiegelman's two children and his wife and collaborator, Françoise Mouly. Mouly has played a key role in Spiegelman's artistic development, travelling with him on research trips to Poland in the 1970s and '80s, and co-editing influential editions of avant-garde comics and cartoons for children with him. But the interview included here is largely personal and adds little to the creative record.

A startling inclusion in MetaMaus is the 40-page transcript of the interviews Spiegelman conducted with his father, Vladek, who died in 1982. These make up the backbone of Maus, where Vladek appears as an irascible, fundamentally wise, consummate survivor, living out his retirement years alone.

Though Maus is full of Vladek, the appearance of these transcripts in MetaMaus seems, at first encounter, like overkill. Why enter this private discussion between father and son in a new, more intimate way? This development is taken one step further on the "hyperlinked DVD" included with the book, on which the interviews appear as audio files, lifted from the original reel-to-reel tapes. In this mode, with Vladek's careful, measured voice outlining the narrative on which Spiegelman built his masterpiece, one does feel as if something rich and new has been added. Vladek's own voice is familiar, with its survivor's Polish Jewish intonations, but surprising, too, as it contains less Yiddish inflection than we might suspect.

We recognize its particularity, as representative of the way a Polish-speaking Jew from Sosnowiec sounds speaking American English. Vladek's own voice carries more eloquence and quiet dignity than one hears in the version Spiegelman inserted in Maus. There is, in these recordings, a mesmerizing effect in the way Vladek calmly works his way through the momentous details of his life story.

Beyond this, the DVD is a disappointment. It contains a digital copy of Maus, which has none of the book's immediacy and warmth. One strange inclusion is dubbed "Art and Françoise's Auschwitz Home Movie," a shakily shot video depicting a 1987 research visit to Auschwitz and its environs. The uninitiated will gain from it a sense of the Polish countryside, of the meanness of rural life in a Communist country before the fall of the Soviet Union, but this presentation of the remnants of Auschwitz and tourists meandering on its paths has little impact. Of interest is a collection of pamphlets that Spiegelman's mother collected, which were published by survivors' groups after the war, and are reproduced on the DVD in image files.



These two pages describe the working process behind the classic book.

Anyone devoted to Maus for its storytelling verve and historical detail will value MetaMaus. Readers who have not ventured into Spiegelman territory will receive from it a weighty and provocative introduction to his oeuvre. As with most of his previous work, in MetaMaus, Spiegelman gets almost everything right.

Norman Ravvin's recent publications include the novel The Joyful Child and Failure's Opposite: Listening to A.M. Klein, which he co-edited with Sherry Simon. An interview focused on his writing is due out in the Łodz-based magazine Text Matters.

Muzika brings Israeli music to North America

Igal Hecht interviews Israeli singer Noa.

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Muzika, a new half-hour TV series that explores some of the most unique, interesting and powerful voices in Israeli music today, will air in Canada in November.

Produced and directed by Canadian filmmaker Igal Hecht and co-produced by Israeli filmmaker Lior Cohen, Muzika explores the hottest Israeli acts in the world. Musicians including Noa, David Broza, Hadag Nahash, Asaf Avidan, Idan Reichel, Karolina, Subliminal, Avraham Tal, Yasmin Levy, Izhar Ashdot and Rona Kenan are featured in the 52-episode program, which is filmed in English.

"Muzika has a simple structure," said Hecht, who has produced, filmed, edited and directed more than 40 documentaries. "The musicians will talk about their careers, highlights and their music. The show's focus is music, so it doesn't incorporate any type of gossip journalism. While the artist explores their career, music videos and live performance segments are incorporated into the show. Lior and I were not trying to reinvent the wheel. This is a simple musical biography show. It is entertaining and fun."

Hecht said he thinks Muzika is a good addition to the television lineup. "It offers a rare opportunity for people to enjoy some of the best music in the world, while at the same time see a different Israel."

Hecht, who was born in Israel and immigrated to Canada at age 11, said he realizes his homeland "is not the most popular place out there. I believe, and have believed for years, that people's perception of Israel is a skewed one. It is based on lies, propaganda and a general lack of understanding of the place."

Hecht, whose documentaries such as Disengaging Democracy, Shield of Solomon and My Flag, tended to focus on Israeli politics, says this show stays as far away from politics as possible.

"We focus on some amazing musicians with some of the best music being produced anywhere right now. Muzika is aimed at lovers of music from all different backgrounds and faiths. If you love music, this is the show for you."

Since he wanted Muzika to explore every genre in Israeli music, Hecht said the show "is not just about hip hop or pop or rock. It gives an accurate portrayal of the music that is being produced in Israel right now. So we have people who sing in Ladino, we have rock artists, people who sing only in English, hip-hop artists, chassidic and religious artists, the Mizrachi genre, reggae, alternative and the list goes on. When choosing an artist, I was looking for something unique. I wanted each week to be a different surprise."

Hecht said it's hard to choose a favourite episode out of the 52 he worked on. "I can tell you that filming David Broza in his home and having him sing me one of my favourite songs was a highlight. Interviewing Izhar Ashdot was amazing. Ivri Lider is one of my favourite artists, so it was very exciting to just chill with him in his studio. Karolina has one of the best voices in Israel, and she was so much fun and super sweet. Subliminal is my favourite hip-hop artist, so sitting with him for an hour was unbelievable."

Every musician was "down to earth, nice and welcoming," said Hecht. "They're a reflection of Israel. I think what many of them liked [about Muzika] was the fact that the intention of the show was just to speak about their art. I didn't ask about politics [and] I wasn't interested in their personal life. The entire show was dedicated to them and their music. The end result reflected that, so they were very excited and always had positive feedback."

Hecht said he isn't aiming Muzika at an entirely Jewish audience or at Israelis who now live in North America. "This is a show for anyone who loves music. The bombs, guns and politics are not what this show is about. I hope people embrace it, give it a chance and enjoy some good beats, wicked riffs and cool musical vibes."

Muzika is airing in the U.S. on Shalom TV and will run here later in November on CTS, Cross Roads Televison.

To learn more about Muzika, check out the Facebook group or visit the YouTube channel at www.youtube.com/user/israelimuzika. To see more of Hecht's projects, go to www.chutzpaproductions.com.

KOFFLER MUSIC PROGRAM IS INSPIRED BY CHAGALL EXHIBIT

The Koffler Chamber Orchestra is preparing to play a concert that famous Russian artist Marc Chagall would have enjoyed immensely.

The opening concert in the Koffler Chamber Orchestra's new season was inspired by the momentous exhibition of Chagall and the Russian modernist artists that is currently on view at the Art Gallery of Ontario. The program features Chagall's favourite composers, Mozart and Tchaikovsky, as well as Alfred Schnittke and other composers who share the painter's Russian Jewish background.

Because Chagall often depicted klezmer musicians and the milieu of eastern European Jewish culture, the orchestra is also playing the Klezmer Dance Suite by Toronto clarinettist Martin van de Ven, who composed it especially for this concert. As well, Schnittke's Piano Concerto will be played by Russian-born Toronto musician Andrew Burashko.

Chagall's Musical World is performed by the Koffler Chamber Orchestra under music director Jacques Israelievitch and featuring soloists Burashko, Semyon Pertsovsky and van de Ven. Art Gallery of Ontario, 317 Dundas St. W. Sunday, Nov. 20, 3 p.m. Free with admission to the AGO, where the exhibition Chagall and the Russian Avant-Garde: Masterpieces from the Collection of the Centre Pompidou, Paris, is currently on view. www.kofflerarts.org

For Children: Lilah, a healthy seven-year old pupil at Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School was once ill with neuroblastoma, a cancer that attacks the central nervous system in young children. In 2004, Lilah's parents, friends and family members established a fund to fight this potentially fatal form of cancer. More than $600,000 has been raised so far towards various research projects at the Hospital for Sick Children. The funds have enabled researchers to acquire more than $3 million in research grants.

Lilah's Fund presents L'il Monkey Jam, with the Monkey Bunch and opener Oozakazoo. The Monkey Bunch is a group of local musicians who play fun songs with an eco twist for kids and their parents; Oozakazoo is a new band with Noa Klar and Josh Engel. They're playing at St. Mike's Auditorium, St. Clair and Bathurst, Sunday, Nov. 6, 3 p.m. Tickets $20 each or $70 for family pack (up to four attendees). Sponsorship opportunities available. www.lilahsfund.com

Names in the News: The London Jewish Film Festival (LJFF) has been busy this week, screening the film Paper Clips to more than 1,300 students at schools in London, Ont., St. Thomas, Tillsonburg and Woodstock. The film chronicles a campaign by Tennessee Grade 8 students to collect six million paper clips to represent the six million Jews murdered in Nazi extermination camps.

Journalists Peter and Dagmar Schroeder, whose book Six Million Paper Clips inspired the 2004 documentary, were scheduled to attend each of the five screenings. "The film has such a great message," said LJFF chair Thelma Rosner. "It's about a school project that made an impact around the world. It shows kids that their actions can make a difference."

Eugene Levy on comedy and Judaism

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

The CJN caught up with award-winning comic actor Eugene Levy at his Los Angeles home before he kicked off this season's Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company's Conversations on the Green series at the Jane Mallett Theatre.

Hosted by Ralph Benmergui, the series consists of one-on-one chats with notable figures from art, theatre, literature and politics speaking about how Jewish culture has influenced their lives and professions.

"I have nothing pre-planned, which is usually the way I like it," said Levy, who joined Benmergui on Oct. 24. "I don't like pre-planning discussions. One of the problems when you do a talk show, they have the pre-screening interview where they want to know exactly what you are going to talk about, and literally prepare every story and anecdote and have to run it past the producer, and they pick out what they want to talk about... So, by the time you say it on camera, you are really just spouting lines."

Eugene Levy

Levy met HGJTC's co-artistic director David Eisner when they worked on a project together. Eisner had wanted Levy to participate in the conversation series earlier, but scheduling prevented Levy from committing until this season.

"I'm not sure if being Jewish has an influence on my comedy and what I do," Levy said. "When I started discovering my own kind of comedic roots back in high school, I don't really think it had anything to do with my Jewishness.

"My first foray into comedy writing was, as it turned out, more akin to John Lennon. He had two books when the Beatles first started – A Spaniard in the Works and In His Own Right. I looked at those books and said this is really close to what I'm actually doing. Just the nonsensical nature of the writing – it was just weird – and I was writing comical little pieces that didn't make any sense at all.

"Later on, when I got into [the comedy club, theatre and school of improvisation] Second City and [the 1976 to 1984 TV comedy show] SCTV, a few of the characters I came up with definitely lent themselves to kind of what I grew up with, Jewish characters. You use what it is you know for the character."

SCTV fans will remember Levy's character Sid Dithers, who spoke in a thick Yiddish accent. Levy describes him as a composite of every short Jewish man with white hair who you saw driving a big Olds 88, and the only thing visible was a little white head over the seat. Levy's other Jewish character, Bobby Bittman, a not-so-good comedian, never really played into his Jewish roots except once, when his equally untalented kid brother appeared with him on SCTV's Sammy Maudlin Show, and the two got into an on-air argument that broke out into Yiddish.

Levy said that Judaism didn't play a big part in his life while he was growing up in Hamilton, Ont., which had a very small Jewish population. "I think I grew up knowing who I was and who my family was, but I didn't grow up... cloistered – it was more secular. I understand trying to maintain your culture, and by the same token, when groups are so insular that they have a tougher time out there trying to relate with other groups. That necessarily is not a great thing, either."

But he said he thinks there is room for Jewish theatre companies. "If shows are being brought in that are very specifically Jewish or catering to the Jewish culture, obviously they wouldn't be brought into a major theatre, because its interest might be limiting to a general audience.

"These are shows and performers that you may not normally get to see. If they weren't bringing it in, the city of Toronto wouldn't have it. [But] just bringing in a performer because they happen to be Jewish, I don't necessarily get that."

In addition to SCTV, Levy is known for his role in the American Pie franchise. He is the recipient of two Emmy Awards, a Grammy Award, an American Comedy Award, a Blockbuster Award and a Golden Globe nomination.

Levy has received an honorary doctorate from McMaster University. His star is on Canada's Walk of Fame in Toronto, and he has received a Governor General's Performing Arts Award. Earlier this year, he became a member of the Order of Canada.

Levy is married to writer Deborah Devine. They have two adult children, Dan and Sarah, and maintain their primary residence in Toronto.

The HGJTC's Conversations on the Green run Monday evenings. Other conversations include former politician Paul Godfrey, who is now the president and CEO of the National Post (Nov. 28); former politician Stephen Lewis, now the chair of the Stephen Lewis Foundation, which supports organizations working on the frontlines of the HIV/AIDS pandemic in Africa (Feb. 27), and actor Marion Ross, who played the mom in the sitcom Happy Days (May 14). For tickets, call 416-366-7723, or online at www.stlc.ca, or at the door.

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL PRESENTS

RESTORATION

Direct from its Canadian premiere at the Toronto International Film Festival, TJFF presents Restoration, the much-celebrated new drama from Israel. 70-year-old Yaakov Fidelman is determined to hang on to the antique restoration workshop which has been his life's work, and rejects his son's wish to close the business and build an apartment complex on the site. Yaakov believes that with the help of his new apprentice, he'll find a way to save his workshop and his solitary way of life. Sasson Gabai (The Band's Visit, Aviva My Love) delivers a quiet but deeply resonant performance as Yaakov, who is being forced out of the life he knows by the dictates of time and old age. "An elegantly-made Israeli drama" (Variety), Restoration has been nominated for 11 Israeli Academy Awards.

Correction

In the article "Playwright did extensive research on Janusz Korczak" (Oct. 12), Korczak is referred to as a Righteous Gentile, a statement that was attributed incorrectly to Hannah Moscovitch. Of course, Korczak was righteous, but not a gentile. He was Jewish. The playwright, as well as the creative team involved in The Children's Republic, including Tarragon Theatre and the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, are aware of Korczak's Jewish heritage, and these facts are reflected in the play. The CJN regrets the error.

Forget Baghdad explores Iraqi Jews in Israel

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Forget Baghdad, an intriguing but rambling documentary written, directed and narrated by a Muslim filmmaker from Iraq living in exile in Switzerland, focuses on the dual identity of Iraqi Jews in Israel.

The film, scheduled for a free screening at the Carlton Cinema in Toronto on Nov. 3 at 5:30 p.m, is presented by Ryerson University and the International Diaspora Film Festival, which highlights the films of Muslim and Arab women and runs until Nov. 6.

Concentrating on four Jews who were forced to leave Iraq in the 1950s and have resided in Israel since then, Forget Baghdad makes the point that while they were regarded as Jews in Iraq, they were perceived as Arabs in Israel. As a result, they were caught between two completely different worlds.

The 111-minute movie was selected by Ella Shohat, a Jew of Iraqi origin who grew up in Israel. Now a professor of cultural studies at City University, she is the author of Israeli Cinema: East/West and the Politics of Representation. Shohat will give a talk on Forget Baghdad at 8:30 p.m., following the screening.

The movie's director, identified only as Samir, broadly explores the nature of cultural and linguistic dislocation. It's not surprising that this topic interests him. His father, a Shiite Muslim and a member of the Communist party in Iraq, fled to Europe after the Iraqi government cracked down on the communists.

In explaining his mission, he says, "I wanted to know what it was like to change country, forget your culture and language and become an enemy with your past." As well, Samir hoped to ascertain how Iraqi Jews have fared in Israel and how they have been portrayed in Israeli cinema.

Samir Naqqash, inset, recollects his youth in Baghdad.

Samir's Jewish subjects were members of the Communist party in Iraq, once the largest in the Middle East. He could easily have chosen Jews of different political persuasions, but for presumably personal reasons, he focused exclusively on the communists.

Although Samir's subjects did not know his father, they shared his beliefs, having joined the Communist party out of a burning desire to fight fascism and oppression. Once in Israel, three of them left the party.

The four men are Shimon Ballas, a professor of Arabic literature; Moshe Houri, a wealthy real estate developer and the sole remaining communist; Sami Michael, a popular author, and Samir Naqqash, a novelist who still writes in Arabic but remains unrecognized and unheralded, not only in Israel but in the Arab world as well.

As the film unfolds, they nostalgically recall their youth in Baghdad – where many of Iraq's 140,000 Jews lived before Israel's emergence as a sovereign state – and claim that Jews were "completely integrated" into Iraqi society.

In 1941, however, a massive pogrom, driven by Nazi propaganda and the pro-German Rashid Ali coup, broke out in Baghdad. The violence, known as the farhud, traumatized Iraqi Jews and converted the four men into communists.

Samir suggests that Israel's establishment, seven years later, adversely affected the venerable Jewish community in Iraq. Iraqi Muslim nationalists accused Jews of being Zionists, setting the stage for their mass departure. All but 20,000 Iraqi Jews emigrated, and Iraq's loss was Israel's gain.

But life in Israel, a nation struggling to absorb hundreds of thousands of Jews from all corners of the world, was hard. So difficult that one of the four men profiled in Forget Baghdad claims it was a "land of thorns."

Their adaptation to Israel is the focus of the film. As far as they are concerned, Iraqi Jews were treated with condescension and disdain by the Ashkenazi elite. "They thought we were primitive," says one of them.

Shohat argues that Ephraim Kishon's celebrated movie, Sallah Shabati, perpetuated negative stereotypes about Sephardi Jews. In a bitter reference to her own family in Israel, she suggests that her father faced a glass ceiling at his workplace and that Iraqi Jews inhabited "a hostile world" in the Jewish state.

But in a balancing observation, Samir allows that Iraqi Jews enjoyed certain advantages in Israel. They were free and they did not have to worry about the spectre of anti-semitism, which escalated in Iraq after 1948. As he further observes, Iraqi Jews eventually accustomed themselves to life in Israel as old prejudices virtually vanished and Sephardi-Ashkenazi marriages grew in number.

In closing, Samir argues that Israel has gradually incorporated Arab culture and food traditions into its national culture. For a country seeking recognition from its mainly hostile Arab neighbours, this is certainly a welcomed development and a step forward in Israel's integration into the Middle East.

Soccer maven describes Jewish ties to 'the beautiful game'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

You only have to visit Israel during an important international soccer match to realize how soccer mad the country is. Restaurants and cafes set up TVs out on the sidewalk for their patrons, the pre- and post-game shows go on forever, the matches themselves are dissected to the tiniest detail and, inevitably, everyone asks the question: Why can't Israel field a good team and make it to the World Cup?

Soccer in Israel is a big deal, acknowledges Shay Golub, but it also has and has had a much wider appeal in Jewish communities around the world.

Golub should know. As chair of a national fans organization in Israel, ISRAFAN and past member of the Board of Directors of Football Supporters of Europe, he has his fingers on the pulse of the sport in Israel and in other locales where Israeli teams venture.

During relatively recent swings to Poland, Germany and Switzerland, he was shocked to see swastikas prominently displayed at football games.

He barely escaped assault at the hands of soccer hooligans in Cottbus, Germany. Supporters of Hapoel Tel Aviv were attacked in a post-game brawl in Warsaw, he said.

Some teams, such as Ajax in Holland, have been known as Jewish teams, even when they weren't, and in Rome, fans have held up antisemitic banners at games of the city's two prominent teams, AS Roma and Lazio.

Looking more deeply into the connection of Jews to the sport, Golub found a rich and storied history, one he believes is largely unknown to today's Jews. Golub and his fiancé were in Toronto recently where he addressed kids at the Robbins Hebrew Academy with stories of Jewish participation in "the beautiful game."

He believes awareness of that history can strengthen the identity of youngsters and instil pride in their Jewish heritage.

"I saw that through soccer you can let young people connect with their Jewish identity, as there were Jewish clubs and Jewish connections to soccer," he said.

Golub sees himself as a goodwill ambassador for the sport "as a way to bridge gaps between people."

Before World War II, Jewish culture thrived in much of Europe "and many Jewish sports clubs were the source of today's clubs. They developed soccer tactics."

Bayern Munich, for one, won its first championship when a Jewish chairman and a Jewish manager led it.

At the time, Zionism stressed physical activity, and many Jewish clubs were founded throughout Germany, Austria, Czechoslovakia and Hungary bearing such traditional names as Hakoach, Hagibor, Bar Kochba, and Maccabi.

Jewish communities "opened clubs for Jewish kids at a time when regular clubs did not allow Jews to play," Golub said.

Many were quite successful. Hakoach Vienna, for one, was "a super club that in 1921 was Austrian league champion."

That championship team won in a way that inspired young Jewish kids at that time. They trailed 1-0 and 2-1 before getting the equalizer. In the last few minutes of the game, their goalie broke his hand and was replaced by a midfielder. The goalie, forced to play upfield, scored the winning goal in extra time, Golub recounted.

Recounting his address to the kids at the Robbins Hebrew Academy, Golub said they showed a particular interest in Israeli soccer.

"This year, a lot of Israelis are playing in European elite leagues, in Poland, Spain, England and Germany," he said.

Maor Melikson is playing in Poland; Dudu Biton plays for Cracow and took them to the national championship, scoring the winning goal.

While the talent level in Israel is respectable, when the players are brought together they can't seem to field a team that goes far in international competitions, such as World Cup qualifying, Golub conceded.

"Many Israeli players are talented but they don't play well as a team," he said. "We don't have a foundation from a young age of playing in the same system."

Accomplished players aren't brought together enough in training camps and they don't play the same system.

Shay Golub

"Soccer is a game of mass energy that reflects society. In Israel, it's eclectic and does not reflect Israel's character. It should be small and clever."

As he imagines it, Israeli soccer would feature fast mid fielders and lots of counter attacks.

Golub is about as familiar with Jewish footballers around the world as anyone, noting that the Americans have had a handful of Jewish players on their national team while Argentina boasts several Jewish elite players, including Juan Pablo Sorín, who captained the Argentine side at the 2006 World Cup.

And according to an article on a British website, "game intelligence," you could outfit a pretty good team, historically, with Jewish players. Most talented among the footballers, if not best known, is Johan Neeskens, a mainstay on the great Dutch teams of the 1970s. Paired with Johan Cruyff, another all-time great, he was instrumental in developing Holland's "total soccer" and scored five goals in the 1974 World Cup.

Others of note in the list include American Jeff Agoos, Hungarian Bela Guttmann, Joe Jacobson, who in 2006 became the first British Jew to play professionally in 25 years, Sorin, and Aron Winter, coach of Toronto FC who's described as "the son of a Muslim father and a Jewish mother."
